How to play difficult music with ease. . .

Pianists who wish to play the music which affords the greatest enjoyment and relaxation—the compositions of the world's greatest musicians—and who are averse to the drudgery of wearisome keyboard practising in order to obtain the necessary technical proficiency, will find the "Brain to Keyboard" method of the greatest possible help.

Practice on this system, much of it away from the keyboard, is never wearisome, and after some weeks of it, spending quite a short time every day, a degree of technical proficiency is obtained which would be otherwise impossible, even after years of keyboard practising for several hours daily.

Sir FREDERICK BRIDGE, C.V.O., has strongly recommended my System, the advantages of which, he stated, he could cordially endorse from his own personal experience. More than 12,000 successful students add their testimony.

"From Brain to Keyboard"

Macdonald Smith's System of Pianoforte Playing.

My illustrated book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing," will be gladly sent to any pianist. It fully explains the principles and advantages of the methods used in the System. When applying, please state whether comparative beginner, average or advanced pianist. The book will be sent free of charge, and post free.

MUSICAL TIMES PRIZES

The proprietors of the MUSICAL TIMES offer two prizes, of the value of Twenty-five Guineas each, for the best composition of—

- (1) An anthem for four voices: soprano, alto, tenor, and bass, with organ accompaniment.
- (2) A part-song, without accompaniment, for four voices: soprano, alto, tenor, and bass.

The words chosen for setting should be either non-copyright, or the option of using them must have been secured by the composer.

No composition, when printed, should exceed in length eight pages of the MUSICAL TIMES, wherein the successful anthem and part-song will appear.

The copyright of the prize compositions will become the property of the prize-givers. The right to withhold the prizes is reserved if none of the compositions submitted attains a good standard. At the same time, the proprietors may negotiate for the purchase of the copyright of any unsuccessful work.

Competitors should keep in mind the average capacity of good choirs.

It will be an advantage if the words selected are unhackneyed, wide in their appeal, and of undoubted poetic merit.

The authorship of each composition must be indicated only by a motto or nom-de-plume written at the top of the manuscript; such motto or nom-de-plume must also be written outside a sealed envelope accompanying the composition and containing the name and address of the composer.

The awards will be made known in the April issue of this journal.

Compositions, which must be received not later than March 1, should be addressed to:

THE EDITOR OF THE MUSICAL TIMES,

160, Wardour Street, Soho,

London, W.-1,

and endorsed 'MUSICAL TIMES COMPETITION.'

B.

MODERN BRITISH COMPOSERS

BY EDWIN EVANS

VII.—LORD BERNERS

In the course of a lecture which he gave recently on 'Modern Tendencies in Music,' under the auspices of 'The Arts League of Service,' Mr. Eugène Goossens, jun., remarked that musical progress in England was exclusively the work of individuals, and that groups or schools did not play the part in it which they do on the Continent. It is a shrewd observation. There exist groups in England, and they are as clannish in their ideas, though perhaps not in their social intercourse, as any on the Continent; but they do not contribute to musical progress. Neither do they seriously impede it. Just as in an exhibition of paintings there will be found represented a number of artists whose province it seems to be to furnish collectively a background from which the work of individuals detaches itself, so we possess a multitude of composers who serve the purpose of maintaining a steady flow of music which only accentuates the achievements of outstanding personalities. A moment's reflection will show that the composers who group themselves readily in one's mind are invariably much less interesting than those who defy all such classifications. We have nothing in this country to correspond, for instance, with the Franckist group in Paris, in which a community of aims does not seem to lessen the prominence of its leading personalities. Still less have we any association on the lines of the six 'très jeunes,' of whom, so far, only Francis Poulenc appears to be known to English musicians. This is very encouraging. In the first place, the richness of our musical background indicates a wave of creative activity which will not spend itself in a generation. In the second place, the sharply-defined individualities which stand out from it point to a love of independence which will cause that activity to retain its significance.

The above is prefatory to saying that, as a composer, Lord Berners stands entirely alone. He not only represents a very special feature in our musical life, but he combines it with a paradox. He has a sense of humour which corresponds to a national trait, but the manner of its expression is international. It is English fun with a Latin pungency, and the blend is sometimes a little perplexing, for side by side with the direct humour in which we recognise something of our own contribution to the world's laughter, his works in this vein display a kind of tangential wit, at times ironic or even perverse, which is the product of his Continental associations. Probably he himself would sometimes experience a difficulty, if called upon to indicate the exact way in which his music is to be taken. There are some forms of humour which cannot be elucidated. One either catches the whim or one does not. Most of Lord Berners's works are like that. They are destined to add to the gaiety of musical nations, but that will not prevent some from treating as mere distortion the harmonic assault upon their dignity. There is probably an even worse tribulation in store for him. He is not always in humorous mood. There is a vein of tenderness that occasionally comes to the surface. It has nothing in common with the form of sentimentality on which his irony frequently disports itself, but it exposes him to the fate which overtook one of our literary humorists who wrote a tragic story about a woman who was crushed by a python, and was told by his critics that he was not so funny as usual. I foresee that one of these days he will give vent to the kindly sympathy of which one is already conscious in some of his work, and be told that the point of his irony has become blunted.

It is not easy to describe the characteristic technical features of his music to the satisfaction of the theorist. In such matters hearing is believing. We may dismiss at once the contention that he does not invent melodies, for nobody has yet discovered a definition which covers the term. The conception of melody not only varies from generation to generation, but differs very strongly with the individual. The gift of melody has in fact been denied to every musician in turn who struck out a path for himself. Mr. Goossens claims that there are seventy real tunes employed in Lord Berners's 'Fantasie Espagnole.' It may be so. I have not counted them, and I regard their presence as irrelevant to the fact that the melodic interest is continuous. From that point of view, one of the most remarkable qualities of his writing is the absence of padding. The musical ideas may not all be of the same consequence, but their place is not taken by remplissage. His harmony is very personal. It is occasionally iconoclastic, but even then there is method in its madness, though the method would be less easy to describe than the madness. When he indulges in a harmonic distortion, it is done not only with good reason, but with great skill—yet such distortions are less frequent than instances of a whimsical inconsequence. Of his ability there can be no question. He works slowly and with great concentration. Even in the most disconcerting examples of superimposed harmonies, there is nothing that savours of arbitrariness. All is carefully pondered, if not calculated. It is a natural consequence of this close deliberation that so many passages in his music, whose aspect on paper is worse than incongruous, sound perfectly natural when performed, with their context, in the right medium.

Gerald Hugh Tyrwhitt, Baron Berners, was born in 1883, and succeeded last year to the title, which is one of the oldest in the Peerage, dating from 1455. He received his first musical education at Dresden, and afterwards had lessons from a well-known English professor. He has become a little weary of the playful remark which appeared in one of his earliest biographical notices, attributing to this experience the qualifications which have served him in the Diplomatic Service, but though too often quoted, the jest is good enough to be perpetuated. No doubt he had ample opportunities for learning the value of compromise, and it is reassuring to be told that he has found the knowledge of some value in the performance of his official duties, for he has certainly made no use of it in his compositions. He also studied for a time at Vienna, and when he was appointed in 1912 to our Embassy at Rome, he worked fitfully with Alfredo Casella. He numbers among his intimate friends Igor Stravinsky, from whom he has doubtless had valuable advice, but although his writing has points of affinity with that of Stravinsky, Casella, and some other modern composers such as Prokofiev, it would be an exaggeration to speak of influence. There is a tendency in modern music to which a number of gifted composers give a certain measure of allegiance, but as its first tenet is precisely the free deployment of individuality, it involves no common method and results in no such resemblances as are commonly met with among followers of a school. The principal analogy is that which causes Mr. Goossens in the article quoted above to describe him as 'a very hot-gospeller of modernism,' an alarming term which in reality means no more than that he is a contemporary and not an ancestor.

As will be seen by the accompanying list, his works are not numerous, and all of them are either published or in the press, with the exception of 'Three Songs in the German manner,' which presumably will see the light one of these days. The origin of these songs is interesting. On reading one of the many biographies of Heine, Lord Berners made the discovery that the poem, 'Du bist wie eine Blume,' which Schumann and other German composers have made famous as a love song, was in reality addressed to a fat white pig. He has accordingly deemed it a pious duty to restore the poet's original meaning, whilst preserving the sentimental character of the German lied.

His first published composition consisted of 'Three Little Funeral Marches,' respectively for a Statesman, a Canary, and a Rich Aunt. Though written in Lord Berners's personal idiom, they are scarcely as characteristic of it as the works which followed, and the humour of the first and third of them is more dependent upon association. They are clever examples of the grotesque in music, but the listener needs to be told of the depressing solemnity of a state funeral on a rainy day and of the improvement in the nephew's material outlook on life, in order to appreciate the joke, whereas some of Lord Berners's later works are intrinsically humorous in their music. On the other hand, the little elegy for a pet canary has a touch of wistful sentiment which makes it a miniature tone-poem. If there be irony in it, we prefer to ignore it and hear only its poetry:

'FOR A CANARY.'

Très lent.
p marcato il canto.
(incisivo.)

'FOR A RICH AUNT.'

(b)

sf

These early compositions were issued under the name of Gerald Tyrwhitt. The next in order of publication was entitled 'Fragments Psychologiques,' and consisted of three short pieces: 'Hatred,' 'Laughter,' and 'A Sigh.' In the actual writing of these fragments there is much more of Lord Berners as we know him to-day than there was in the 'Funeral Marches,' and yet their outlook is not completely characteristic, except perhaps in 'Laughter.' Here we find a passage that is typical of many, an apparently illogical sweep of inconsequent notes, difficult to justify on any grounds other than that it has exactly the effect which its author intended:

Ex. 2. Le rire.

It is not realistic. It bears no relation for instance to Moussorgsky's much quoted but somewhat discreet notation of laughter, for the simple reason that it is concerned not with the sound but with the motive of laughter. Instead of reproducing the effect itself it provides an analogous cause from which the effect results. At the same time the device itself is as elastic as the idiom to whose vocabulary it belongs. It is capable of other applications, just as in ordinary speech words of identical etymology can be made to carry essentially different meanings. In 'Le Poisson d'Or,' for instance, which spurred Mr. Ernest Newman to creative effort in the columns of the Observer, there occurs the following:

Ex. 3.

which belongs to the same family of ideas, but is made to do duty for other associations. In all this there is an appositeness that is equally hard to describe or to explain. It is like certain forms of wit in that it sounds better than it looks on paper. But there has been so much music of which the opposite is true!

'Le Poisson d'Or' is really the earliest of Lord Berners's pianoforte compositions, although it appeared third in print. It is dedicated to Igor Stravinsky, and purports to comment upon a story of a sentimentally inclined goldfish, consumed with longing for a mate as bright as a sovereign, in place of whom he is given a mere prosaic breadcrumb which he swallows without interest. The music is slight, but interesting chiefly because of some deftly contrived figures which the well-disposed may regard as cleverly descriptive, but which in any case have a fascinating sound. The publishers of this piece embarked upon a new policy by securing a pictorial cover and other decorations from no less an artist than Madame Natalie Gontcharova, who is known in England chiefly by her brilliant staging of 'Le Coq d'Or.' Similarly, the work which was next to appear in print is decked in ambitious designs by M. Michel Larionov, whose work we have learned to appreciate in the ballet 'Children's Tales.'

This work consists of three pieces for orchestra which were introduced in the provinces under the conductorship of Mr. Eugène Goossens, jun., and at the Alhambra Theatre in London under that of M. Ernest Ansermet. Here we begin to be concerned not only with more ambitious achievements, but with music that realises more closely Lord Berners's vision of his own aims. The three pieces, 'Chinoiserie,' 'Valse Sentimentale,' and 'Kazatchok,' are, both in technique and in expressiveness, a great advance upon all that went before. The composer has gained assurance in the handling of his medium. It has become a more obedient servant—at least; that is the impression it makes after the first exhilaration of hearing such music has passed. The pungency of the style may be judged from the following:

Ex. 4.

(a) 'CHINOISERIE.'

(b) 'Valse Sentimentale.'

These three pieces, which are published in the form of duets for pianoforte (four hands), contain within themselves the starting point of the two works which followed. In the 'Valse Bourgeoises' the composer develops ideas similar to those of the 'Valse Sentimentale,' which, it is not irrelevant to note, is dedicated to Mr. Eugène Goossens, jun., also a composer with a sense of humour. The 'Kazatchok,' on the other hand, points its fun at the purveyors of local colour of all climes, and may therefore well be the parent notion from which sprang afterwards the 'Fantaisie Espagnole,' though the irony is in this case less obvious.

The 'Valse Bourgeoises' are three in number. The first is a 'Valse Brillante,' in which occurs the following :

Ex. 5.

The second of these examples shows a more amplified harmonization of the combined themes which open the 'Valse Sentimentale.' It will be noted how one of these endeavours, in accordance with convention, to appeal to our feelings, whilst the other indulges in ironic asides which betray a truer worldliness. The contrast is of a kind that Lord Berners loves to make. Sometimes he even likes to leave us in doubt as to which is the side for which he invites our sympathetic assent. But here at least there is no doubt. The waltz is a clever parody of a well-established tradition, and a theatre audience was not slow to appreciate its humour. It is not impossible that an audience more conscious of its musical proclivities would have needed correspondingly longer.

Stravinsky hails the last four bars of the above example as one of the most 'impertinent' passages in modern music. It is more than likely that this opinion will be echoed by many a reader of this article, if not with the same inflection. It is all a matter of point of view. Mr. Newman regards Lord Berners as the gamin in English music, but I fancy his tongue is more often in his cheek than protruding. Either way, he has his full share of original sin.

The second number is a 'Valse Caprice'; the third is entitled 'Strauss, Strauss et Straus.' Here there are frank and recognisable deformations, to one of which is appended the remark 'Mais je connais ça.' The fun is broader, and could scarcely be missed by the dullest pedant, but it is perhaps somewhat less of an achievement to caricature Johann, Richard, and Oscar than to satirise a generic type of composition which delighted entire generations of drawing-room amateurs. In the corresponding music of to-day it would be far easier to pen an acceptable caricature of some popular waltz-king than it would be to ridicule in one piece the whole cult of the Valse lente.

The 'Fantaisie Espagnole' is at present Lord Berners's most important work. There is probably no country which has suffered so severely from the manufacturers of spurious local colour as Spain. Nearly every composer, great or little, has at some time or other tried his hand at evoking the Spanish atmosphere by means of devices, chiefly rhythmic, which have been so completely conventionalised that no Spanish peasant would recognise them as part of his national idiom. It is only in recent years that even in Spain itself composers have been found with sufficient initiative to brush aside all this lumber and get down to facts. Even the French composers whose tone-pictures of Spain carry conviction give us the fleeting impression of cultured travellers rather than sympathetic interpretations. Meanwhile the average Spaniard, like the average Englishman, is far more familiar with the music of the cosmopolitan music-hall than with that of his own tradition. 'This confusion of ideas between the real and the false Spain has its humorous side which Lord Berners has been the first to discover. He does not profess to know Spain except through these various musical portrayals, the common features of which he has exaggerated in a spirit of raillery which is not in the least unfriendly. The spirit of such a composition demands that the effects should be piled up in ironical profusion, with a degree of technical extravagance that underlines their cumulative humour. Occasionally, may be, it is underlined somewhat heavily, but happily not to an extent which would remove all doubt whether this composition is to be taken seriously or humorously, for it is in that doubt that resides a great deal of the wit expressed. We are not sure that Lord Berners is laughing all the time, and, when he is, we are uncertain whether he is laughing at us for taking him seriously, at his brother composers, or at himself. There is not enough of the grotesque to make the music a caricature, but the local colour is over-accentuated to a point which approaches at times to the burlesque, without, however, leaping the frontier. As music, it is somewhat tantalising: as a contribution to the perennial controversy in which the subject of folk-music is enveloped, it is invaluable.*

The 'Fantaisie' consists of a Prelude, Fandango, and March, the whole occupying about ten minutes.

I am not at liberty to describe the work upon which Lord Berners is now engaged, but it is one which provides free play to his wit besides some temptations to extravagance—if he should feel that way inclined.

A point which has considerable bearing upon the direction he is likely to take is that his irony is always characterised by unflinching good temper. It is, perhaps, this which most clearly distinguishes it from the irony of our Gallic neighbours, which is more often spiteful. It is really very amiable leg-pulling, and the salt of satire is most carefully kept away from anything resembling a wound. Above all, it is never rubbed in. At the same time, it is accompanied by so much fancifulness, that in other days than the present Lord Berners's humour might not improbably have taken a more romantic channel. I am not aware whether he is a lineal descendant of that Lord Berners of the 16th century who gave us the English version of 'Huon of Bordeaux,' which was our first introduction to the realm of King Oberon, but if he is, his family history is repeating itself, for, if King Oberon were real to us to-day, he would almost certainly be a humorist. It would be his only chance of defending his kingdom against the onslaught of the Philistines.

ASPECTS OF DVORÁK'S CHAMBER MUSIC

BY H. C. COLLES

The visit in the summer of the Czecho-Slovak musicians to London, and the subsequent reappearance here of the Bohemian Quartet in the autumn, have brought Dvorák once more directly into our line of vision, and made it pertinent to ask whether he is a neglected or an over-rated composer. The warm welcome which he and his music received here in his lifetime has given him a name which lasts, yet in almost every department he is known by one or two works only. Speak to any amateur of music about his five published Symphonies and you are almost sure to get some reply about the beauty of 'From the New World.' Suggest to a professional string quartet that a work by Dvorák would be welcome in their programme, and Op. 96 in F, popularly called the 'Nigger,' is almost certain to make its appearance. But there are eight String Quartets published by Simrock, and most of them, before the war at any rate, were available in miniature scores at what seems now an almost nominal price. In other departments of chamber music the 'Dumky' Trio and the Pianoforte Quintet are the two works which 'go,' while the former is the last of four, and there are two String Quintets and a Sextet which might share the popularity of the latter. Dvorák in fact is known by samples. In so far as the rest of his work is up to sample he is neglected; in so far as it is assumed to be so without inquiry he is over-rated.

It seems worth while then to look more closely, and to ask, Are the qualities which we love in the Dvorák which we know equally present in that which has been passed over? If not, have these works other qualities not so easily appreciated?

Since Dvorák's works of all classes, exclusive of opera, are registered by opus numbers running to well over a hundred, it is clearly necessary to confine attention to one department. Chamber music for strings was a means of expression to which Dvorák remained consistently faithful through his whole life without thought of immediate publicity. Here if anywhere he wrote for himself, shaping the ideas which, in his own phrase, 'clamoured in his head,' into the form which seemed to him the most consistent.

In re-studying the scores of the String Quartets and kindred works lately, I confess to having looked narrowly for evidence of what Mr. Fuller-Maitland in his article in Grove found to be a matter for 'slight censure,' that is to say a tendency to keep up the interest 'not so much by ingenious developments and new presentations of the themes, as by the copious employment of new episodes, the relation of which to the principal subjects of the movement is of the slightest.' The search has been so little successful that on the contrary it has seemed that censure, and that not always slight, might be applied for the opposite defect of labouring the development of ideas too slender for such treatment. The classical models were something of a snare to Dvorák. He early gained extraordinary facility in manipulating them, and the moment a characteristic germ of melody entered his head he was ready to spin it into the web of sonata form. Take, for example, the first movement of the Quartet in C, Op. 61:

The two motives (a and b) which make up the theme are not particularly inspired. The one irritatingly suggests 'See the conquering hero comes'; the other says, 'No, after all it's only I, Dvorák.' Yet does he desert them for the 'copious employment of new episodes'? Not a bit of it; the two chase each other through a lengthy exposition with child-like delight in existence. He is in love with his theme, and for the hearer who is not, there is no reprieve until the second subject makes its legitimate appearance:

Ex. 2.

Here is something which has that charming undulation of outline together with a hint of harmonic excursion instantly recognisable as Dvorák's most spontaneous self. One could wish that he would break bounds and go the way it seems to beckon, but he is too conscientious. The episode and the syncopated rhythm to which it leads fill a strictly subordinate place in the scheme, and when the double-bar has been reached the 'Conquering hero' and its sprightly pendant take the field again and hold it.

Such movements as this—and this is not an isolated instance—tend to show that there was an element of luck in Dvorák's work. When he chanced on thoroughly congenial and tractable material at the outset, all went well; on the other hand an awkward opening might prejudice the success of the whole thing. He was not a keen critic of his own musical matter, and was 'apt to get his matter in the wrong place. This second motive (Ex. 1, b), which seems so uncomfortably placed in the first movement, is perfectly appropriate when it reappears as the subject of the Scherzo:

and its brilliant treatment in this form makes the whole movement sparkle with life. It has got rid of its companion, and become free and happy.

In the earlier Quartet, Op. 34, in D minor, dedicated to Johannes Brahms, as in the much better-known one, Op. 51, in E flat, dedicated to Jean Becker, the luck of the start was on Dvorák's side. The Quartet in E flat stands second in popularity to the 'Nigger,' so we may look preferably at the opening of Op. 34, which is more often passed over:

Ex. 4.

This is the germ of the whole movement. Its suave and fluent melody grows naturally out of the quiet phrase proposed by the first violin. The gentle chromaticism of the two inner parts expands unchecked and unforced. The second subject itself is an extension from a motive of the first:

Ex. 5.

The two belong to one another so completely that throughout the long development one hardly knows which Dvorák has most in mind:

Ex. 6.

The whole movement, like this example, runs on velvet. It is not emotionally intense because there is little or no clash of ideas, though it has its declamatory moments where the rhythm breaks into a more emphatic mode of speech. But everything is beautified by the unity of idea variously expressed. And that is what one looks for from Dvorák.

A great deal has been said about his national feeling shown in his use either of actual folk-melodies or ideas akin to the folk-music and dance forms of his country. But all such primitive music, whether sung or played—the chivalric ballad and the polka, the love song and the 'Dumka'—has this in common, that it is essentially occupied with one idea at a time. The Alla Polka which follows the first movement in Op. 34 is a one-idea movement. The Polka and the Trio stand well apart from one another; the latter is an interlude which just gives the dancers a breathing space before they resume. In such simple forms Dvorák is always in his element; he is care-free and spontaneous. But it is not always that he can carry that same spirit into the developments of larger and necessarily more closely knit forms. That he should ever have been able to do so, as he certainly has in this first movement, is indeed the marvel of his genius. His failures in this respect occur most often in his first movements; the Finales which are always close to the dance spirit, however widely they may depart from any known dance form, are practically unfailing. The Finale of the C major Quartet, for example, gets into its stride at once with a dance measure which seems a near relation of Haydn's famous 'Kolo':

Ex. 7.

With its rhythm dominating the whole score, there is no fear of incoherence by the introduction of new episodes; the more the merrier. As a matter of fact, new melodic forms crowd in in quick succession, and even the second subject proper is more a new version of the dance measure than a new idea:

Ex. 8.

Dvorák solves the problem of the Finale instinctively, and it is a problem which over and over again baffles composers of a more introspective kind. In how many modern sonatas, trios, and quartets does the composer let himself down by trying to keep himself up in the Finale? One can think of many instances where a first movement starts with a fine impulse, contrasts that with lighter middle movements, and then wearies us by trudging over the same emotional spaces as the first movement only with greater labour. But with Dvorák it is the other way; his first movements may be rather laborious, as this C major one is, or may have the suavity and charm of the D minor and E flat Quartets, but in either event the Finale 'makes good,' more than atoning for the defect in the first case, carrying us from pleasure to delight in the second. The Sextet in A for strings (Op. 48) may be cited as an exception because the Finale is here cast in rather formal variations of an exceedingly beautiful theme. The numbers labelled Var. 1, 2, 3, &c., in the traditional way are not specially eloquent in shedding new light on the tune until the Stretto, the free and vigorous Gigue which brings the whole to a climax. Possibly the fact that the Sextet was written just about the year (1878) when Dvorák had first attracted the favourable attention of Brahms accounts for the experiment in a style of which the latter was the greatest master of modern times. But it is the drooping beauty of the 'Dumka' and the virile energy of the 'Furiant' which most make one wish that this work occasionally got the public performance which now has been denied to it for so long.

Dvorák's style in chamber music underwent a much greater development in the course of his working life—that is, some twenty-five years of continuous production—than is generally realised. That development is rather obscured by the American episode which now takes so large a place in the popular conception of his personality. Included in that with the 'New World' Symphony are the String Quartet in F and the String Quintet in E flat. Certain aspects of these works show them to be rather a return to his early style than a logical phase in his own development. Though he denied with some emphasis the adoption of negro melodies as subjects, he was indubitably trying to talk their musical dialect, and like many people who experiment in foreign dialects he instinctively and unconsciously reverted to his own. Though the works immediately before the American group have plenty of the distinctive features of Dvorák's own Bohemian music (they include the Pianoforte Quintet with its 'Dumka' and 'Furiant,' the E major Quartet with a similar pair of movements though not called by these names, and the famous 'Dumky' Trio itself), yet in the larger works among them there are qualities of design and feeling quite beyond the charm of local colour, which, failing a better word, one must describe as cosmopolitan. See for example the extraordinarily subtle uses of expression to which a phrase, which might come from any source, is put in the first movement of the E major Quartet:

Only a composer with a long vision before him could start so unpretentiously on a big enterprise. The style no longer has that velvety smoothness remarked in the early D minor Quartet, but is far more full of incident, more various in its view.

In the American works Dvorák returned to primitive ideas which reveal their content on their first statement, their charm resting chiefly on a certain piquancy lying lightly on the surface. It may be argued that in handling such ideas he was really at his best, that as his nature was not a very profound one any more highly intellectualised style was liable to lead him astray, that he lost more than he gained in this process of evolution. But at present few of us are in a position to support such an argument, because the bulk of the later works remain in neglect. The two last Quartets, Op. 105 in A flat, and Op. 106 in G, are certainly not Dvorák at his happiest, but they are Dvorák speaking with great earnestness and force. The remarkable passage in the Finale of the last, into which he has woven material from the first movement, shows an appreciation of texture as against simple beauty of outline which has no parallel in the early Dvorák of the dialect pieces. The fact is that the whole series form in their strength and weakness, their simplicity and their complexity, an extraordinarily human document. They show the effect of contact with the larger world upon an unsophisticated nature too sensitive to remain uninfluenced by such contact but too true to lose its identity. Sophisticated audiences are naturally most attracted by the evidence of naivety, but one can only get the measure of the character by a knowledge of the whole.

THE BANE OF CLEVERNESS

BY GERALD CUMBERLAND

For the last twelve months almost every writer and public speaker has taken a strange delight in giving vent to pessimistic utterances 'prophesying woe.' The miasma of pessimism has not yet entered the field of music, so I propose in this article to take it there.

At this moment our British composers are in a condition of curious and (to me) disturbing self-satisfaction. They believe that, at last, they have really begun to compose. Until 1914 many of them were deriving much of their inspiration from Germany; since 1914 they have, they declare, been deriving it from themselves—they have at last formed a British School. Not a school founded on folk-song, of course, but, nevertheless, a school so militantly British, so militarily British, that its members will listen to no music that is not Allied music. In other words, our young men have shut their eyes, opened their mouths, and seen what France and Russia would send them.

And France and Russia have sent them more than was expected, more than was bargained for. Russian composers who for twenty years had been only names, suddenly became realities. In the spring of 1914 the Russians calmly organized a revolution in London: they gave British composers their rich, new wine, blood-red and heady, in queer-shaped goblets studded with precious stones. The Britishers drank and, like Tristan, began to dither divinely. They have dithered ever since. When the war arrived and German music became an impossibility, they ravaged France for music and discovered that Debussy and Ravel were not the only Parisian gods alive. So they dithered in the French manner. Though Diaghileff called Brahms a putrefying corpse, and Schumann a dog baying at the moon (or was it the other way about?), he was not the first to do so: these things were said secretly in 1915. They are said now . . . even in Surbiton.

So, swallowing Russian vodka—and even trans-fusing it into music—and absinthe, without digesting either, our composers suddenly became British. It is true that Mr. Cyril Scott went on being Mr. Cyril Scott—a very harmless occupation,

The

Competition Festival Record

No. 138.

Those of us who are fairly frequent attendants at Competitive Festivals are usually struck by the poor standard attained by the instrumental soloists, compared with that reached by the vocalists, especially in the choral classes. Some such disparity is not unnatural. Although finished singing is the product of years of study, a quite acceptable—even enjoyable—result may be attained in a comparatively short time. The instrumentalist has a long row to hoe, and before he can make any impression has a lot to learn in the handling of his implement. The singer, if he is wise, remains a student for years, but he becomes a performer in a simple but not unpleasing way at an early stage. The budding pianist or violinist has no material for public performance so good and satisfying, and at the same time so simple, as the wealth of fine songs, traditional and otherwise, which lie within the powers of anybody with a fair voice and some musical feeling.

But when these facts are taken into consideration, there is still an unduly large proportion of young instrumentalists unable to do more than make a fair attempt at the bare notes of the test-piece. Anything in the way of interpretation is rarely forthcoming. The writer recently heard nearly a hundred youthful pianists, of ages ranging from eight to sixteen. The majority were miserably inadequate so far as mere finger-work was concerned. Not more than twenty could be regarded as technically satisfactory, and less than a dozen showed a grasp of the musical side of the test. At the same Festival almost as many vocal soloists of the same tender age competed, and the proportion of those showing interpretative ability, joined with fair technical power, was surprisingly high.

Unless this unfortunate disparity between young players and singers is removed, the development of our future musical public will be disastrously uneven. We have seen how Wales has suffered through backwardness on the instrumental side. Thanks to our greater wealth in the matter of fine orchestras, our danger is not so acute, but it is a real one nevertheless. The remedy would appear to lie in a more sparing bestowal of prizes and certificates. An announcement to the effect that in certain instrumental classes the judges felt unable to make any awards would cause the local teachers to overhaul their methods. Fond parents, as a body, would begin to ask questions. The answering thereof would hurt some feelings, and perhaps damage some local reputations. But until a good many teachers are made to feel uncomfortable, there will be no improvement. More and more it is becoming painfully evident that one of our chief needs of the moment is a School for Elementary Music Teachers.

A kindred matter badly needing attention is that of accompanying. Why will teachers with a very poor idea of this difficult art insist on accompanying their pupils at competitions? It not infrequently happens that the young singer is hampered by the erratic keyboard work of the very person from whom he or she should expect help, not hindrance. Even the official accompanist is not always first-rate. Nothing but the best should be good enough. Bearing in mind the general failure to realise what accompanying is, our Festival committees might well consider the advisability of engaging from London, or the nearest large centre, an accompanist of high reputation, in order that a standard may be set up for the guidance of local musicians.

THE Y.W.C.A. EISTEDDFOD.

The Annual Eisteddfod of the Y.W.C.A. was held on December 13 at the Association's headquarters, Morley Hall, Hanover Square. There was a large entry, about forty trios, quartets, and choirs competing. Among the choirs were a good proportion of newly-formed organizations. The vocal material generally was excellent, and there was no lack of intelligence and appreciation. The chief weakness (especially in the new choirs) lay in the part-singing. Some of the choirs sang the unison-song delightfully, but were quite at sea when divided for part-singing. Teachers should devote time to the study of rounds in order to overcome this weakness. In all but a few cases, too, the sight-singing needed more attention. Dr. George Grace judged the trios and quartets, and Mr. Harvey Grace the choirs. The following were the winning choirs:

ADVANCED CHOIRS.

- 1st. Wimbledon Park.
- 2nd. St. Peter's, Paddington.

ELEMENTARY CHOIRS.

- 1st. Princess Arthur Club, Blackheath.
- 2nd. Wandsworth and South Croydon (tied).

ADVANCED SIGHT-SINGING.

- 1st. Ealing.
- 2nd. Wimbledon Park.

ELEMENTARY SIGHT-SINGING.

- 1st. Wandsworth.
- 2nd. Stanhope Club, Highbury.

TRIOS.

- 1st. South Norwood.
- 2nd. Rossie House.

QUARTETS.

- 1st. Wimbledon Park.
- 2nd. Hampstead.

A NEW DEVON COMPETITION.

At a meeting held at the Deanery, Exeter, on December 8, it was resolved to found Devon County Music Competitions in affiliation with the National Association of Music Competitions. The Dean presided, and a helpful address was given by Lady Mary Trefusis, Chairman of the National Association, and hon. secretary of the Cornwall Music Competitions. For many years it has been felt that Devon should commence activity in this direction. The meeting gave promise that great interest would be taken in the scheme, and that good support would be forthcoming.

The Langley Mill and Aldercar Co-operative Society held its annual musical Festival at Langley Mill on December 6, Mr. W. Woolley adjudicating. Seven solo-singing contests were held, and one for male-voice quartets, in which the singing of the Langley Mill party was the chief feature of the Festival.

PEOPLE'S PALACE (EAST LONDON).

This Festival is chiefly useful in providing a meeting-ground for a great number of choirs—especially school and other junior choirs—that can only respond to local stimulus. It not only invites choirs and bands to compete, but caters very elaborately for their various capabilities and constitutions. The competitions are to be held at the People's Palace on February 26 and 28 for evening institutes, children's choirs, and elementary schools, and on May 4-15 for the remainder. Mr. T. F. Dunhill, Mr. Harvey Grace, Mr. Granville Humphreys, and Mr. C. Kennedy Scott will adjudicate, and the hon. secretary is the Rev. C. J. Beresford, 392, Commercial Road, E.

AYRSHIRE.

The fourth Ayrshire Musical Competitive Festival is announced for April 23 and 24, to be held at Kilmarnock. This gathering was last held in 1914. The new syllabus is similar to that last adopted, with the addition of further classes for church, artisan, industrial, junior, and school choirs. In the open challenge choral contests the tests are Marson's five-part madrigal, 'The nymphs and shepherds danced,' and Elgar's six-part unaccompanied chorus, 'Go, song of mine,' for mixed-voice choirs; and Elgar's 'The Réveille' and 'After many a dusty mile' for male-voice choirs. Dr. Brewer is to adjudicate. The hon. secretary is Mr. Robert D. Wood, 81, King Street, Kilmarnock.

STRATFORD (EAST LONDON).

The syllabus of the thirty-eighth Stratford and East London Festival, to be held on April 24, 26, 28, 29, 30 and May 1, displays the comprehensiveness that has always been its characteristic. In opening its competitions to residents in East London and the county of Essex the Festival exerts an educational influence in large populous districts that have few opportunities of musical enlightenment. There are certain sections open to all-comers which on previous occasions have attracted choirs from a considerable distance. The seventy-eight classes provide for adult and junior choirs of all sorts; vocal solos (under nineteen heads), duets, trios, &c.; pianoforte playing (twenty-two classes), including duets, sight-reading, and scale-playing; organ, violin, violoncello, pianoforte trio, and string orchestra; elocution and composition. Mr. J. Graham, 74, Park Hall Road, Finchley, London, N. 2, is secretary. The long list of adjudicators includes Mr. James Bates, Dr. Percy Buck, Mr. Frederick Corder, Dr. Henry Coward, Mr. Ernest Fowles, Mr. Alfred Gibson, Mr. George Oakey, Mr. Daniel Price, Mr. Felix Swinstead, and Miss Katie Thomas.

COMPETITIONS IN 1920.

Below we give all the information we have received with respect to future Competition Festivals, with dates, names and addresses of secretaries and adjudicators:

ABERDEEN.—April 24. Dr. J. R. Elder, 189, Westbourne Road, Aberdeen. Adjudicator, Mr. David Stephen.

that Mr. Eugène Goossens, jun., wrote, among other things, an imitation of a musical-box made in Geneva, that Mr. John Ireland became yellow-booky and tried to discover what Arthur Symons sounded like when read aloud on the pianoforte, and that many of the smaller fry (very small fry, these!) wrote Songs of Sussex, London Lyrics, Manchester Melodies, and Noises from Nottingham. But most of their confrères did their utmost to realise what it felt like to be long-haired, velvet-coated decadents in the Latin Quarter, or horny-handed peasants in Yasnapaniasnavolupski. Not one of them succeeded. They became neither Frenchmen nor Russians; they remained merely their rather dull selves.

In these experiments to found a British school by making France and Russia their spiritual homes, our young composers began by throwing sentiment to the winds. Not that they called it sentiment: 'sentimentality' was the word they used. They saw that there is little sentiment and no real tenderness in the more important modern French composers, and they admired the orgies of savagery in which most of the Russians indulge. They perceived that even Tchaikovsky has little nobility of sentiment, for they detected in his weeping melodies nothing but a series of self-pitying orgasms. So, said they, sentimentality must go. And go it did—if, indeed, it ever was there. One fears it has gone never to return. They wrote brainy music: 'awfully clever' stuff: music that in its effort to mean so much, ended by meaning nothing at all. Emotion? Bless you, no! The Germans were emotional! These young British lions were all head and no heart; they were like creatures roaming about with the heads of lions and the hearts of rabbits.

Many are bubbling over with delight at this state of affairs. It is Progress. We are now making headway! Brahms is a cretin; Schumann, a man who wears goloshes when out of doors and knitted canvas slippers at home; Wagner, a wretched fellow with his eyes in the stars and his soul in the dung-heap; Richard Strauss, a Berlin cad. Put Holst—regardez! what genius! Goossens—attendez! what daring! what originality! Delius—tiens! what an intellect! And so on. But some of us see in all this hard cleverness, this acrobatic ingenuity, this musical psycho-analysis, not the seeds of decay but decay itself. No one is so clever as the man who argues his own soul out of existence, no one so 'smart' as the fellow who can wink with a monocle in his eye, no one so up-to-date as the man who has never had a past and, most assuredly, will never have a future.

Clever! Oh, yes, this growing band of musicians is very clever. As if cleverness in art were everything—or, indeed, anything! Has anyone ever disgraced himself by calling Elgar 'clever'?—or Bantock?—or Vaughan Williams? Yet this is the adjective that is most constantly and very aptly applied to these young composers, whose music is like the shaking of precious stones in a tin can. Composers of music require just that degree of cleverness which will enable them to acquire the amount of technique necessary for self-expression. When a poet, or a painter, or a composer possesses a perfect technique and yet has nothing to express with that technique we call him clever. And rightly so, for it is a term of insult. Nowadays we judge a work, not by its content, but by the manner in which that content is expressed. That is real artistic decadence.

If, then, the great emotions are dead in our music, how may we bring them back? Not by an effort of will: not by striving to be original: not by slavishly copying someone else. In order to express great emotions, one must first of all feel them. One almost blushes to write down anything so obvious, but when so many young composers are regarded by themselves and others with the solemn respect that one pays only to men of genius, one feels that it is the obvious that needs underlining.

There can be little doubt that the present-day fear of feeling emotion is due to the strain of the war: we have all felt so much, and suffered so much, that most of us have no capability left for profound emotion—or, if we have, we are unwilling to exercise that capability. Our hearts are sore, so we use our brains. There are very few creative artists whose gifts have not been temporarily impaired by the war. At the moment of writing, I can think of only one first-rate artist whom the war has not half-suffocated—Vincenzo Ibanez, the great Spanish writer. But if, as I believe, this is the prime cause of our present sterility, it will pass away with time. Yet nothing can be more stupid, more certain to hinder the revival of the creative spirit among us, than to regard the work of the 'new' School as anything more than clever, experimental stuff that will be utterly forgotten in two or three years. We cannot make a thing great, or fine, or noble, by continually bestowing any—or all—of those adjectives upon it. We only make ourselves ridiculous.

Fortunately, there are signs that the craze for Russian music is dying quickly. For more than five years it has held a place in our esteem out of all proportion to its merits. It has served its turn: let it go. And as for French music, so much stuff of poor quality is dinned into our ears that one feels inclined to echo the aphorism of the late Hans Richter, who, on being asked why he did not play any at his concerts at Manchester, replied: 'French music? Why, there isn't any!' Certainly there is no great music now being published in France—nothing to touch the work of Elgar. But we have for so long allowed ourselves to be charmed and interested and amused by modern French composers, that we have lost sight of the fact that to charm and interest are not the sole functions of art.

THE ORGAN WORKS OF BACH

BY HARVEY GRACE

PRELUDE

There are enough fine books on Bach to make a series of articles on his organ music seem unnecessary. But as a matter of fact the student who wishes to read about this branch of Bach's output will find the Bach literature not very helpful and far from convenient. In the first place, the books usually survey the whole field, with the result that there is insufficient space for the detailed consideration of the various portions of it. Usually the organ music suffers the most by this lack of space. For example, in Parry's fine study ('John Sebastian Bach') only about twenty-five of its 572 pages are devoted to the organ works. The gigantic Toccata and Fugue in F has to be disposed of in less than a page, and the six Trio-Sonatas in about a page and a half. The references in Spitta are numerous, but they are so scattered about the three volumes as to be almost lost in the mass of other material. Schweitzer (perhaps because he was an organist) is fairly liberal in his treatment of the organ music, but as his book ('J. S. Bach, le Musicien-Poète') is concerned chiefly with the programmatic aspect of Bach's works, only the Choral Preludes come in for extended notice. Pirro's 'L'Esthétique de Jean-Sébastien Bach' deals chiefly with the composer's treatment of the orchestra and with his methods of accompaniment, the organ music being given a few pages of the chapter, 'La musique instrumentale.' Rutland Boughton's excellent little handbook is for the general reader rather than for the organist.

On the ground of previous insufficient treatment there is thus ample justification for such a series of articles as is here projected. But there are two more practical reasons. All the big Bach books are so costly as to make the average organist think twice before buying, especially to-day, when he is notoriously the worst-paid member of the musical profession. And it must not be forgotten that it is the average organist who needs consideration in this matter, since for him and for his pupils Bach is regular daily fare. Secondly, as the writers on Bach have not usually been organists they could hardly be expected to look at the subject from the practical playing point of view. Now, no instrument has developed so wonderfully as the organ, and, as a result, the playing of early organ music gives rise to a host of problems and considerations that occur comparatively seldom in the performance of other works of the same period.

The following articles will aim at an exhaustive survey of Bach's organ music, regarding it from the point of view of the modern player. If some of the conclusions arrived at run counter to those generally accepted, there need be no surprise. The subject is one on which there is room for widely differing opinions, none of which are wrong; indeed, granted the point of view, they may all be equally sound.

The writer is well aware of the difficulty of his task. He ventures on it as a lifelong devotee of Bach, and claims on behalf of his views that they are the result of intimate acquaintance with the music and of a fairly long experience as player and teacher.

Although in discussing certain points as to textual reading, registration, laying-out, &c., various editions will be alluded to, it will be convenient to use only one for general reference. In considering the Choral Preludes, the melodies and the text of the hymns are so important that the chosen edition must be one in which these are available. Apparently the only edition answering this requirement is that of Novello (vols. xv.-xx., the whole of the Chorals and a portion of the text in German and English being given in vol. xx.). The references will therefore be made to that edition, the number of the volume and the page being shown in Roman and Arabic numerals.

I.—EARLY WORKS

It is unfortunate that, in England at all events, the most widely-known of Bach's early organ works are by no means the best. This is due to the fact that until very recently the organ music based on choral melodies was a sealed book so far as most English organists were concerned. And yet among Bach's youthful efforts are some choral variations that, by reason of their intrinsic merit and their value as technical material, are far more deserving of attention than certain of the immature preludes and fugues with which so many students begin their study of his music.

The exact chronology of Bach's organ works (especially the earliest) is uncertain. But we may safely say that he began his career as organ-composer (as he certainly ended it) by treating a choral melody. His output during the Lüneburg period (age fifteen to eighteen) seems to have consisted entirely of Choral Partitas—sets of variations. Two of these—a set of eleven on 'Ach, was soll ich Sünder machen?' and another of seventeen on 'Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr'—are so elementary and inferior as to make one question their authenticity. Spitta regards the former as genuine, but makes no reference to the latter. He mentions, however, a set of seven variations on 'Herr Christ, der Ein'ge Gottessohn' as being almost certainly by Bach, and dating from the Lüneburg days. They were still in MS. in 1880. The two sets first mentioned above are to be found in vol. ix. of the Best-Hull edition (Augener).

The only works of this period that are worth our attention to-day are the Partitas on 'Christ, der du bist der helle Tag' ('O Christ, Who art the Light and Day') and 'O Gott, du frommer Gott' ('O God, Thou faithful God') (xix.).*

One of the most certain evidences by which we may assign Bach's organ music to this

* The Partita on 'Sei gegrüßet, Jesu gütig,' belongs partly to the Lüneburg period. Some of the variations were written at a much later date, however, so they will be discussed in a future chapter.

Lüneburg era is the almost entire absence of an independent pedal part. Bach's post at Lüneburg (where he received a monthly salary of twelve groschen) was one of general utility—accompanying on the harpsichord at rehearsals, playing the violin in concerted music, and probably acting as assistant choir director, his own singing voice having temporarily disappeared. He had little opportunity for access to the organ, and therefore composed for the two-manual harpsichord, though occasionally he seems to have had the organ at the back of his mind. The Partitas are for manuals, with brief ad libitum indications for the pedals. The idiom is usually of the type proper to an instrument deficient in sustaining power. The writing is unequal, but there are so many passages of pure Bach that we cannot afford to neglect the works. It is worth noting that the chief weakness is in the matter of plain harmonization. For example, here is the first phrase of 'Christ, der du bist der helle Tag':

Spitta points out the clumsy effect of the six-part chords on the weak accents, with four-part harmony between. He might have further drawn attention to the lack of harmonic enterprise. In the ten bars we find the tonic chord, in root position, no less than fourteen times! And such clumps of notes as hardly suggest the Bach we know.

But the best of the variations show a grace and polish quite remarkable in an age when the keyboard idiom was still far from defined. We have more than a peep of the real Bach in such passages as the following, with its satisfying two-part writing, its little two-note leaning figure in the right hand, and the delightful bit of echo:

In the third variation we meet with a little figure which was destined to play an important part in some of the best of the Choral Preludes:

The closing bars of this variation are worth quoting. They might have been written in Bach's maturity:

The final variation gives us an ad libitum pedal part which needs treating with discretion. It consists of the choral melody in crotchets. But as the left hand gives us an ornamental form of the tune in the bass, the pedal part, unless played with very quiet 16-foot tone alone (uncoupled, of course) merely muddles the effect. Played on the harpsichord the pedal notes quickly ceased sounding, and little or no damage was done. On the whole, the pedal part is best omitted. Certainly the use of Pedal 32, 16, and 8-ft. with reeds coupled to Great (as is suggested by some editors), seems indefensible, unless the lower of the left-hand parts is omitted. Here is the first phrase of this variation:

Ex. 6.

MAN.

PED. (ad lib.)

It is worth noting that the number of the variations corresponds with the verses of the hymn, showing that already Bach, like Böhm and others, was more or less working on a programmatic basis. The connection between the music and the words is less clear than in the bulk of the Choral Preludes, but it is there. Before leaving the work, one more passage deserves quotation. It is the final cadence of the last variation, with a daring use of an auxiliary note:

Ex. 7.

&c.

Played at the right slow pace, the fifths and the unexpected touch of the chord of A minor at* are calculated to make even a stolid player sit up, especially if the pedal part be omitted.

Much of what was said above applies to the variations on 'O Gott, du frommer Gott.' We find the same clumsy method of harmonizing the choral, and the same graceful writing in the variations. Again the sections are the same in number as the verses—nine. The connection between words and music is of the slenderest, save in sections vii. and viii., where the more expressive character of the music seems to be a fairly obvious reflection of the increase of emotion in the text. No. viii. contains some beautiful writing of the chromatic type which Bach usually adopted when dealing with the idea of death, e.g.:

Ex. 8.

There is nothing of the 'prentice hand here, especially in such details as the inverted pedal point in bar 3, or the touching together of the E natural and B natural in the last bar.

These Partitas show in a marked degree the influence of Georg Böhm, who was organist at St. John's Church at Lüneburg during Bach's stay. Böhm seems to have imbibed a good deal of the spirit of contemporary French clavecin composers, and no doubt much of the grace of Bach's early keyboard writing is due to French influences received thus second-hand. To Böhm he certainly owes his trick of beginning each set of variations with a primitive kind of ostinato—an idea which bore fine fruit later in the so-called 'Giant' fugue, and in several of the numbers of the 'Little Organ Book.' The few examples of Böhm's work that survive show him to have been a much more imaginative and decorative writer than Pachelbel, and a more intimately expressive one than Buxtehude. It is but fair that the influence he exerted on Bach should be noted. We shall see a further striking example later.

But, imitative as these early works inevitably are, they are at the same time characteristic. As Spitta says:

Throughout, indeed, in spite of their reliance on an outside model, these chorale variations bear witness to a quite extraordinary talent. They are by a youth of sixteen or seventeen, and what natural beauty they display! What freedom, nay, mastery of the combination of parts! Not a trace of the vacillating beginner feeling his way. He goes forward on his road with instinctive certainty; and though here and there a detail may displease us the grand whole shows the born artist.

I have dealt rather fully with these two early works because they seem to be so admirably adapted for technical purposes. They are far more interesting than much of the manual work usually given to students in the early stage. Moreover, the best of the variations are well worth playing. With two well-contrasted manuals and light promptly-speaking stops, they may be made into enjoyable little pieces. The player will get a delightful foretaste of the intimate character that makes the best of Bach's music so vital to-day; he will also discover the seeds from which spring some of the mightiest of musical growths.

Interludes

BY 'FESTE'

The only works of art that are really boring are the mediocre. An out-and-out bad composition has an entertaining quality all its own. After the winner and his hottest rival have passed the post, the most conspicuous competitor is usually the last. The public has no eye for the undistinguished ruck between: it thinks only of the laurel wreath and the booby prize. For this reason I am grateful to the reader who sends me a copy of the worst oratorio ever written. I had often heard of it, and had vainly searched the second-hand bookshops for a copy. Now it drops into my lap, as such good things have a way of doing. There may be wide difference of opinion as to the finest oratorio, or the half-dozen finest; there can be but one verdict as to the worst. It is surely 'Ruth,' by — but on second thoughts I suppress the composer's name. He may have left descendants, and I would not willingly hurt their feelings. 'Ruth,' was published by the composer, at 60, Kingsland Road, Shoreditch, the price being one guinea and a half. There is no date of publication, but a note over the libretto tells us that the work was 'first performed in the Town Hall, Prahran, near Melbourne, Victoria, Jan. 21st, 1864.' A good many of the subscribers were Melbourne folk. Among the English patrons are few of note in the musical world—'Goldschmidt, O., Esq.,' and 'Oakeley, H. S., Esq., Professor of Music in the University of Edinburgh,' are the two that first take the eye.

We are all busy to-day either writing or reading accounts of new works that are important, or will (perhaps) be important ten years hence. As a refreshing change, let us spend a few minutes with one that never mattered to anybody but the composer. In order to get the right sympathetic point of view, we will put the clock back to 1864. . . . I am a reviewer, with a friendly feeling towards the new work and its composer, whose name I will change to George Olthurst.

'Of all the forms of musical art, that most calculated to elevate and inspire is the oratorio. We may well be proud of the fact that it has nowhere flourished so vigorously as in this great country. Not only do we keep alive the immortal works of Handel: our own composers, with that mighty exemplar before their eyes, also enter the field from time to time, and so carry on the great line. The latest of these native oratorios is "Ruth," by George Olthurst. The words are "selected chiefly from the Holy Scriptures," and the work is dedicated "To the Queen: a humble tribute of devotion"—a worthy offering to the Gracious Lady to whose discriminating patronage we owe so much of our happy acquaintance with the noble music and the gifted artists of the Fatherland. "Ruth" upholds the classic form and tradition so well suited to its sacred theme. It begins with an Overture in D, an imposing Andante chiefly based on the tonic chord, and a lengthy Allegro. The opening subject of the Allegro is of a tripping character, the right pastoral atmosphere being subtly suggested by the bare fifths and fourths of the accompaniment:

Ex. 1. Allegro, $\text{♩} = 116$. Cello.

Viol.

'This theme is treated canonically, after which we have another subject of bold type, opening with the notes of the chord of the tonic, followed by a brief excursion into G and C. But the composer rightly believes that departures from the original key should be few (if any), and as brief as possible. So, by means of an ingenious use of the chord of the augmented sixth, he quickly leads to the chord of the dominant (A), giving us fifteen bars of it, in order to induce a feeling of security. He then starts on his third subject, again making use of the key of D:

Ex. 2. Viol e clari. e flauti;

'The student will note how skilfully the composer obtains homogeneity by use of the same key and style for his first and second subjects. No. 2 is extended by a series of pleasing scale-passages—also in D major—after which it returns (still in D), but now enriched by being given out in sixths by the violins and trumpets, stability being provided by the use of the same accompaniment as before. The whole of the overture (about 200 bars) is based on this material. The composer wisely eschews any display of technical skill. He rightly regards the simple presentment of his themes as being consistent with the pastoral nature of his subject—"Ruth," as I have already pointed out.'

'The opening chorus tells us of Elimelech's sojourn in Moab, with Naomi his wife and his two sons. The style is as simple and direct as in the overture. Nothing could be more definite and satisfying than the composer's treatment of historical narrative. See, for example, this little extract dealing with the marriage of Naomi's two sons:

Ex. 3.

f
And they took them wives of the wo - men of f

p the name of the one was Or - pah, the name of the

o - ther Ruth; and they dwelt there a - bout ten years.

f dim.

'These qualities of directness are conspicuous throughout the work. When Naomi's daughters-in-law (two in number, as we have just seen) express their determination to return with Naomi, they could employ no more fitting strains than the following:

Ex. 4. SOPRANO 1.

SOPRANO 1.
SOPRANO 2.
Sure - ly we will re - turn with thee,

- turn with thee, Sure - ly we will re -
Sure - ly we will re - turn with thee,
- turn with thee, . . re - turn, . .
Sure - ly we will re - turn, . .

'Note how the unanimity and eagerness of these two faithful young women is expressed by their employment of the same phrase, not together, but in a free kind of canon at the octave. This beautiful interplay of melody is given its full effect by the slenderness of the accompaniment, which does little more than double the voice parts. The first flush of enthusiasm over, the young women (it may be well to remind the reader that the name of the one was Orpah, the name of the other, Ruth) get together, ending the duet with seven emphatic repetitions of the word "return."

This insistence on the salient word is a notable trait which Olthurst and Bach have in common. The chorus following Ruth's further declaration of fidelity (Orpah having backslidden, and gone away) gives us another example. The words of the chorus are: "When she saw that she was stedfastly minded to go with her, she left speaking unto her." Here is the opening: (Note how the austere simple choral writing suggests "stedfastness." The accompaniment adds to the significance by doubling the voice parts, plus a repeated high D):

Ex. 5. ff

When she saw . . that she was sted - fast - ly, ff
sted - fast ly mind - ed to go with her.
then she left speak - ing un - to her.

'Among the solos, pride of place must be given to the cry of the desolate Naomi, "I went out full." This touching air is preceded by a lengthy introduction (alla marcia, con dolore) which strikes the right poignant note. I quote the first few bars of the Prelude, and the opening phrase of the song:

Ex. 6 (a).
Grave. ♩ = 54.
Alla marcia con dolore.

'Part 1 of the oratorio ends with a chorus, "Blessed be the Name of the Lord. Amen." At first Olthurst appears to be about to write a choral fugue on conventional lines. He breaks away from tradition, however, for the subject, though dealt with by all the voices, never appears in more than one part at a time. The four voices are supported by emphatic chords of tonic and dominant alternately on the first beat of each bar, and are employed together only in chordal repetitions of "Amen," save at one glorious moment at the end, where we have a masterly piece of close imitative writing:

'Part 2 opens with a broadly vigorous setting of the words: "And Naomi had a kinsman of her husband's, a mighty man of wealth of the family of Elimelech, and his name was Boaz." Here Olthurst rightly emphasises the two facts of importance—the kinsman's wealth and his name. About twenty times the chorus emphatically refer to the former. I have not time to count the settings of "his name was Boaz." I will allude only to the composer's care in making it clear that "his name was Boaz"—not the husband's or any of the neighbours'. He does this by the simple expedient of setting the word "his" to an accented note, a plan consistently carried out. I quote one of the vigorous passages showing this attention to detail:

Ex. 8. CHORUS.
Voices in octaves and unison.

'As space is running short, I must be content with drawing attention to only two more points—first, the exquisite piece of tone-painting in No. 44, and the skill of the final fugue. In the former, Olthurst sets out to give us a picture of daybreak. A somewhat lengthy extract is necessary to show how he gradually piles up his effect until we emerge from the chill of dawn into the full blaze of day:

'We have here a work which is a credit to native art. Beyond doubt the musical future of our race rests chiefly in the hands of composers of such sacred works as this. We welcome Mr. Olthurst as a new-comer into a field he is certain to adorn. That "Ruth" will not be his last work is certain, for we hear that he has almost finished an oratorio on the story of Balaam. We are assured by a mutual friend that this marks an advance on "Ruth." The composer's great natural gift for descriptive writing has full play in the passage relating to Balaam's journey. Our friend tells us that he has rarely been so affected by any music as by the aria of the Prophet's faithful and ill-used beast, a setting (given, with sure instinct, to the tenor) of the words "Am not I thine ass?"'

PURCELL'S 'FAIRY QUEEN'

BY WM. BARCLAY SQUIRE

The performance on the stage of Purcell's 'Fairy Queen,' which is announced to take place at Cambridge next February, promises to be an event of unusual interest. The difficulties in the way of presenting to a modern audience the early attempts at English opera make it impossible for a manager who has to depend on his box-office receipts to venture on performances so far removed from modern tastes. All the more praise is therefore due to Cambridge for attempting a revival of a Restoration opera, even shorn as the performance must be of the spectacular effects upon which its attraction originally so largely depended. This is not the place to enter upon any lengthy dissertation of what an 'opera' meant at the end of the 17th century. It was a hybrid form of entertainment, lineally descended from the Masque, from the latest developments of which it inherited sung recitative, dances, and especially the introduction of 'machines,' either representing clouds, flying figures, &c., suspended by ropes, or set pieces with mechanical action, generally rolling on wheels. In the Masques of the age of James I. or Charles I. such devices were elaborated to an extraordinary extent and at an enormous cost, far beyond the means of the licensed companies who supplied London with theatrical performances after the Restoration. Indeed, the secret of their construction would seem to have been lost, for it is recorded that the idea of such spectacular displays was derived from Paris, whence they were introduced by Betterton after a visit to France in 1683. As to the companies which occupied the London stage a few words are necessary, in order to understand the origin of the 'Fairy Queen' and its operatic predecessors. In 1660 Charles II. granted licenses to two dramatic companies in the Metropolis. The first of these was the King's Company, which after performing in Clerkenwell and Gibbon's Tennis Court in Bear Yard, occupied a theatre of its own, on the site now covered by Drury Lane Theatre. The second was the Duke's Company, which first performed at the Cockpit, Drury Lane, then in succession at the Apothecaries' Hall and at a theatre in Portugal Row, Lincoln's Inn Fields. In 1670 there was built for this Company a theatre on the east side of Salisbury Court, on the site of the gardens of Dorset House (burnt down in 1666). This theatre was designed by Wren, and it is said that the decorations were by Grinling Gibbons. It was larger than the Drury Lane house, and had approaches both by land and water. Views of the exterior and the stage—almost the only ones we possess of London theatres of this time—are to be found in Elkanah Settle's 'Empress of Morocco,' and show it to have been a very beautiful house. It was opened in November, 1671, by the Duke's Company, then managed by Lady Davenant, her son Charles, and two of the principal actors, Harris and Betterton. For some years the two companies remained in rivalry, but in 1682 the audiences at both houses having steadily diminished, the two companies joined forces. The united companies opened in November, 1682, and henceforward the Drury Lane house was used for plays requiring little scenery, while the Dorset Gardens Theatre (afterwards called the Queen's) was devoted to spectacular performances. But by 1700 the fortunes of the Queen's Theatre had declined, and early in the 18th century it was taken down.

Purcell's regular connection with the stage seems to have begun about 1690, though before that he had occasionally written incidental music or songs for plays, his first dramatic work being (according to Downes) the music in Nat. Lee's 'Theodosius,' produced by the Duke's company in 1680. But with the amalgamation of the two companies and the production of spectacular pieces at Dorset Gardens he found a much wider scope for his talent. It is to this that we owe 'Dioclesian' (performed in 1690), 'The Tempest' (1690?), 'King Arthur' (1691), 'The Fairy Queen' (1692), and 'The Indian Queen' (1695)—all of which, with the exception of 'Dido and Æneas' (written for private performance), have more claim to be regarded as operas than his other dramatic music. Operas in the modern sense they were not, for the musical portions were distinct from the dramatic, and their performance entailed a double company, the actors being the most important, the singers and dancers being only added (like the 'machines' and scenery) to make up the whole hybrid spectacle. But though we may regret deeply that the theatrical state of the day did not allow Purcell to develop the remarkable insight into what opera should be which he showed in 'Dido and Æneas,' it is something to be thankful for that the displays at the Dorset Gardens Theatre enabled him to write the beautiful music which has survived after the merely dramatic scenes of these 'operas' galleries abutting on the proscenium, the second tier reaching to the top of the stage opening. Over this there was a considerable projection, occupied by a room lighted by windows from the sides and with a wide opening to the auditorium. This room is conjectured by Mr. W. J. Lawrence, a great authority on the subject, to have been a survival of the music-room of the Elizabethan stage, and to have been generally used by the small band of players who were sufficient for the slightly-orchestrated curtain- and act-tunes and overtures have long been dead and forgotten. Can, then, these works be revived? That is the question which Cambridge has set itself to solve. How difficult a problem it is may be gathered from a short description of 'The Fairy Queen' and the theatre where it was produced. Of the dimensions of the Dorset Gardens Theatre we know nothing, but, so far as can be judged by the plates in 'The Empress of Morocco,' it must have been rather lofty in proportion to its width, with two tiers of required for ordinary dramatic performances. But for works like the 'operas' produced at Dorset Gardens it is obvious that this position of the orchestra would be impossible, even if the room over the proscenium was sufficiently large; and it is evident that for these productions the orchestra occupied the position it does in the present day, i.e., on the floor of the pit. This is made clear by the directions in Shadwell's version of 'The Tempest,' performed at Dorset Gardens in 1674, which read as follows:

The Front of the Stage is open'd, and the Band of 24 violins, with the Harpsicals and Theorbo's which accompany the Voices, are placed between the Pit and the Stage.

This description of the orchestra is particularly interesting. The 'Band of 24 violins' was evidently the Royal Band, established by Charles II. early in his reign in imitation of the band of twenty-four violins of Louis XIV., and 'the Harpsicals and theorbos' were spinets and arch-lutes, used to accompany the numbers in the score which have bass and violoncello. But it was not only for instrumentalists that the royal musical establishments were drawn upon for the Dorset Gardens performances. Entries in the Lord Chamberlain's accounts for 1674 show that men and boys of the Chapel Royal were allowed to sing in 'The Tempest,' and one may safely conclude that the chorus—and possibly some of the soloists—in 'Dioclesian,' 'King Arthur,' 'The Fairy Queen,' and 'The Indian Queen,' consisted of members of the King's Chapel. The trumpeters and drummers required in 'The Fairy Queen' only a basso continuo. The theorbos would give the additional depth of tone wanting in the spinets. They were used in England until about the middle of the 18th century, and are seen in illustrations of the Chapel Royal; indeed, lute-books are still in existence in the choir library at St. James's Palace, and the office of lutenist survived in the Chapel Royal until 1846, though it had long been a sinecure. In operatic orchestras the arch-lute, as an accompaniment to recitative, was succeeded by the double-score were also probably supplied by the royal establishment; in 1692 the office of Serjeant Trumpeter was held by Matthias Shore (d. 1700), the eldest of a celebrated family of performers. The plates in 'The Empress of Morocco' do not give any indication as to the lighting of the theatre; but it is known that at this time the front of the house was lighted by candles, and the frontispiece to Kirkman's 'The Wits' (1672-73) shows that footlights—apparently each containing two candles—were used for the stage.

'The Fairy Queen' was produced in the spring of 1692. There are several allusions to it in Motteux's Gentleman's Journal. In May, he recorded that ... the Music and Decorations are extraordinary. I have heard the Dances commended, and without doubt the whole is very entertaining.

In Downes' 'Roscius Anglicanus' (1708) we are told that it was superior to 'Dioclesian' and 'King Arthur':

... especially in cloaths, for all the Singers and Dancers, Scenes, Machines, and Decorations [were] all most profusely set off; and excellently perform'd; chiefly the Instrumental and vocal part Compos'd by ... Mr. Purcell, and Dances by Mr. Priest. The Court and Town were wonderfully satisfy'd with it; but the Expenses in setting it out being so great, the Company got very little by it.

The play was published in 1692, and a revised version followed in 1693, 'with Alterations, Additions, and several new Songs.'

Neither version contains the names of either actors or singers, but from various contemporary printed collections of songs we know that the chief vocalists were Mrs. Ayloff, Mrs. Dyer, Mrs. Butler, Freeman, Reading, and Pate, all of whose names are of frequent occurrence in the dramatic literature of the end of the 17th century. Mrs. Ayloff was the original Miss Prue in Congreve's 'Love for Love' (1695); of Mrs. Dyer we know very little. Mrs. Butler took the part of Phillidel in 'King Arthur' (1691). She 'was allow'd in those Days to sing and dance to great Perfection.' Freeman sang in nearly every one of Purcell's more important odes and operas, and Reading and Pate seem to have been chiefly comic singers—the latter, in particular, being associated with 'female impersonations.' Both were concerned in a riot in 1695, and in consequence deprived by the Lord Chamberlain of their share in the company. Pate seems then to have gone to France, for Luttrell's Diary records, five years later, 'that Mr. Pate, who belonged to the play house here, and sung so fine, is committed to the Bastille at Paris for killing a man, and that he is condemned to be broke on the wheel.' He must either have been pardoned or have escaped, for he sang at Drury Lane in 1700 and 1702, and was buried at Hampstead on January 14, 1734.

The book of 'The Fairy Queen' is a very curious adaptation, by an anonymous author, of Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' though it does not contain a single line of the original to which Purcell has set music. The first Act—especially in the 1692 version—follows Shakespeare fairly closely; but in the revised version it was altered, and a musical scene was introduced for the entertainment of Titania's Indian Boy. Part of this scene is devoted to the tormenting of a drunken poet by fairies. The poet, with his stammer, was doubtless intended for Tom D'Urfey, who was known as 'Poet Stutter.' It has been suggested that Shadwell, who was renowned for hard drinking, was meant; but this is very unlikely, as he had only recently died (in November, 1692). In Act 2, after two scenes compressed from the original, Titania causes the scene to change to Fairyland:

... a Prospect of Grotto's Arbors, and delightful Walks: the Arbors are adorn'd with all variety of Flowers, the Grotto's supported by Terms, these lead to two Arbors on either side of the Scene, of a great length, whose prospect runs towards the two Angles of the House. Between these two Arbors is the Great Grotto, which is continued by several Arches, to the further end of the House.

In Act 3, a similar change of scene is made by Titania, this time to ... a great Wood; a long row of large Trees on each side; a River in the middle; two rows of lesser Trees of a different kind just on this side of the river, which meet in the middle, and make so many Arches; two great Dragons make a Bridge over the River; their Bodies form two Arches, through which two Swans are seen in the River, at a great distance.

Many surprising things happen:

While a Symphony's playing, the two Swans come swimming on through the Arches to the bank of the River, as if they would land; these turn themselves into Fairies, and dance; at the same time the Bridge vanishes and the Trees that were arch'd raise themselves upright.

The fourth Act is still more elaborate. Titania and Oberon 'call for musick' to 'welcome up the rising Sun,' and the scene changes to a Garden of Fountains. A Sonata plays while the Sun rises; it appears red through the mist, as it ascends it dissipates the Vapours, and is seen in its full Lustre; then the Scene is perfectly discovered, the Fountains enrich'd with gilding, and adorn'd with Statues. The view is terminated by a Walk of Cypress Trees which lead to a delightful Bower. Before the Trees stand rows of Marble Columns, which support many Walks which rise by Stairs to the top of the House; the Stairs are adorn'd with Figures on Pedestals, and Rails, and Balusters on each side of 'em. Near the top, vast Quantities of Water break out of the Hills, and fall in mighty Cascades to the bottom of the Scene, to feed the Fountains which are on each side. In the middle of the Stage is a very large Fountain, where the Water rises about twelve Foot.

In the course of the scene 'a machine appears' (probably lowered from above), 'the clouds break from before it, and Phœbus appears in a Chariot drawn by four Horses.' The last Act contains some of the scenes from Shakespeare's Act 4, but has an entirely new ending. Theseus disbelieves the 'Antick Fables' and 'Fairy toys' told by the two pairs of lovers, so Oberon and Titania enter, and to 'cure his incredulity,' exhibit a fresh series of wonders. First, 'Juno appears in a Machine drawn by Peacocks,' then 'while a Symphony plays, the Machine moves forward, and the Peacocks spread their Tails, and fill the middle of the Theater.' The machine ascends, and after an utterly irrelevant song, the stage is darkened, and ... a single Entry is danced. Then a Symphony is play'd; after that the Scene is suddenly illuminated, and discovers a transparent Prospect of a Chinese Garden, the Architecture, the Trees, the Plants, the Fruit, the Birds, the Beasts quite different to what we have in this part of the World. It is terminated by an Arch, through which is seen other Arches with close Arbors, and a row of Trees to the end of the View. Over it is a hanging Garden, which rises by several ascents to the top of the House; it is bounded on either side with pleasant Bowers, various Trees, and numbers of strange Birds flying in the Air; on the Top of a Platform is a Fountain, throwing up Water, which falls into a large Basin.

The Chinese scene gives an opportunity for introducing a duet between a Chinese man and woman; this is followed by the appearance of six monkeys, who 'come from between the Trees and dance.' Hymen next appears:

Six Pedestals of China-work rise from under the Stage; they support six large Vases of Porcelain, in which are six China-orange-trees, the Pedestals move towards the Front of the Stage, and the Grand Dance begins of Twenty-four Persons.

The Chinese man and woman dance, and after a grand chorus (accompanied by the dancers) the work ends with a sort of Epilogue, spoken by Oberon and Titania. It is solely for these interpolated scenes that Purcell has written music; the rest of the action is compressed from Shakespeare, with some alterations of his poetry, and it will be noticed that the scenario is so arranged that the spoken scenes are played with scenery for which a simple painted back-cloth is sufficient, so as to allow for the elaborate staging of the spectacular scenes being set farther back on the stage. The introduction of the Chinese scene, with its 'Vases of Porcelain,' was quite in accordance with the taste of the day for 'Chinoiserie'—traces of which may still be seen in the china collected by Queen Mary which is preserved in the state rooms at Hampton Court Palace.

As has already been said, 'The Fairy Queen' was not a financial success, and not long after its production the fortunes of the Dorset Gardens Theatre began to decline, so that the work was never revived. In 1701 an advertisement appeared in the London Gazette offering a reward of twenty guineas for the recovery of the score, which had been lost owing to Purcell's death, and in 1703, 'at the desire of several Persons of Quality,' 'one intire Act of the Opera call'd The Fairy Queen' was given at a concert at Drury Lane Theatre. This was probably the fourth Act, several full scores of which exist, probably made before the whole score was lost.

The recovery of this precious MS. is a somewhat remarkable story. With a view to printing 'The Fairy Queen' in the Purcell Society's edition of the composer's complete works, the late Mr. Shedlock, with infinite labour, pieced together what could be found of the music, both in the 'Select Songs in The Fairy Queen,' printed in 1692, and in various other printed and manuscript sources. The result was obviously incomplete, but it had been already engraved for publication when the editor, happening to be in the Library of the Royal Academy of Music, took down a folio volume from one of the shelves and opening it found, to his surprise and delight, that it was none other than the long-lost full score of 'The Fairy Queen.'

From internal evidence the volume would seem to have belonged to one William Savage (c. 1700-89), a pupil of Pepusch, and subsequently to R. J. S. Stevens (1757-1837), who left it to the Royal Academy of Music. It may be conjectured that Savage obtained it from Pepusch, who was for several years connected with Drury Lane Theatre and was an enthusiastic collector of musical manuscripts. The Academy score is mostly in the handwriting of one or more copyists, who seem to have put it together as Purcell completed the various numbers, leaving blanks for what was not ready, which were afterwards partly filled in by the composer himself. A few numbers are not in the score, but nearly all these could be supplied from the sources which Mr. Shedlock had already drawn upon, so that the work as eventually published by the Purcell Society in full score, and by Messrs. Novello in octavo pianoforte score, is the completest example we possess of an English opera of the end of the 17th century.

WHAT WAS 'A NEW FINGERIT ORGANEIST?' AN ANTIQUARIAN QUERY

By CLEMENT ANTROBUS HARRIS

About 1520 there was born one Thomas Wood, or Wodde, most likely in Scotland, as his life-work was done there. In 1566 he was made vicar of St. Andrew's, Fife, and in the same year produced an illuminated Psalter which affords remarkable proof of Scottish skill in diatonic harmony. He also produced 'Airs and Sonnets,' and is believed to have outlived the century. (He must not, of course, be confounded with the much better known Oxford musician and antiquary, Anthony à Wood, born more than a century later.) The reason for mentioning him here is that among the contributors to his Psalter was Sir John Futhy, or Fethy, whom he describes as 'the first new fingerit organeist that ever was in Scotland.' What is the meaning of this phrase, the use of which I do not recall in any other instance? The first solution which comes to mind is to be found in the introduction of a freer use of the thumb—the passing it under the fingers as a pivot on which to turn the hand. And I have a strong impression of having seen an allusion to Wood's description of Futhy in which this interpretation was taken for granted. But a little reflection will show such an explanation to be untenable. The first system of fingering of which the details are known is that of Ammerbach. In this the right-hand thumb is never used at all, and the left hand very rarely; and the date of publication is 1571—twenty-seven years after Futhy had been appointed organist at Aberdeen.

The free use of the thumb by Handel and Bach was sufficiently uncommon to excite remark nearly two hundred years after the 'new fingerit organeist' had somehow astonished his colleagues north of the Tweed and the Cheviots. So long, indeed, did the old three-finger system continue in use, that a book based upon it was published as late as 1718! Unless, therefore, we are to assume that Scottish organists were more than a hundred and fifty years ahead of their brethren in other parts of the world, some other solution must be found.

Now Scotland was much more advanced in regard to organs in pre-Reformation days than most Englishmen, or even Scotsmen themselves, realise. Native of Edinburgh though he was, William Tytler's statement, made in 1779, that organs were introduced into the country by James I. in 1424, is clearly wrong; and yet it has been copied by such authorities as Grove's Dictionary (vol. iv., p. 394, 1911 edition), though refuted by William Dawnay as early as 1838. The fountain-head of Scottish history prior to the 15th century is John of Fordun's 'Scotichronicon,' written some time prior to 1385, about which time its author, a secular priest of Aberdeen, is believed to have died. And describing the removal of the body of Queen Margaret from the outer church, Dunfermline, for re-interment beside the high altar, which took place in 1250, Fordun says that the priests and abbots by whom the ceremony was conducted were accompanied by the sounds of the organ as well as by the chanting of the choir. Further, though the exact date of the carvings of musical instruments at the south-east end of Melrose Abbey cannot be determined, they tend to confirm this evidence, not only because they show the highly musical taste of these Scottish monks, but because they include the regal, or primitive organ, which such carvings rarely do, and the abbey was built between 1326 and 1505—the eastern portion evidently first. Nevertheless, I am not prepared to advance the proposition that Scotland was ahead of the rest of Europe in organ-building and playing, and that by nearly two centuries!

But it is incumbent on those who reject this proposition to suggest an alternative interpretation of the term 'new fingerit organeist.' The obvious field of search is the evolution of the art of organ-building, and the object of search some development which took place during Sir John Futhy's lifetime. (It need perhaps hardly be pointed out that the title 'Sir' indicates not a secular knight but one of 'the Pope's knights'—that is, a priest—being a customary mark of respect for that order of the ministry in the 16th century.)

FROM THE MALLERMI RIBLE, 1490.

A little model, about seven inches high, in baked uncoloured clay, apparently intended for a domestic ornament, found among the ruins of Carthage in or near the year 1885, shows plainly that a keyboard had been attached to a hydraulic organ about the year 120 A.D.—the period known to be that when the potter who made the little model lived and worked. But the device does not appear to have been common, or to have spread to Europe. Consequently, Western organ-builders had to re-invent keys for themselves, and did so towards the close of the 11th century. The first known keys, those of an organ built for the Cathedral at Magdeburg, were an ell long and three inches broad. Now, if the reader does not feel very certain as to the precise length of these keys he need not blush, for the ell differs considerably in different countries, and Rimbault, from whom I quote the information, does not say what particular kind of ell he means! The English ell is nine inches more, and the Belgian ell nine inches less, than a yard in length. What the German one is I cannot say, but probably it was of the shorter length. The point is that in either case the key was sufficiently long and broad to need putting down with the fist. Hence the mediæval title for a player on the organ—Pulsator Organorum. Nearly three hundred years later, in 1361, Nicholas Faber, a priest, built an organ at Halberstadt which included chromatic notes arranged in a manner very similar to that of a separate manual. These latter, it is thought, were pressed down by the middle three fingers of the hand, and the diatonic notes of the lower manual by the under side of the wrist. In the course of the 15th century the keys were several times reduced in size. Thus the 'naturals' of the organ in the Church of St. Ægidius at Brunswick were only about an inch and three-quarters in width on the Great manual, and an inch and a half on the second manual, called Rückpositiv (= Back-choir organ, this register having originally been placed behind the player). Inflected and natural keys were placed on the same manual, and they look, in the illustration given by Praetorius, as though they could be played by an alternate use of the thumb and two fingers. Not unreasonably this instrument has been regarded as 'perhaps the very first to foreshadow the modern keyboard.' In the organ erected in the Church of St. Blasius at Brunswick, by Kranz, in 1499, an octave was brought to within about a note of its present width. But, early as this is, I doubt whether the Kranz instrument was the first organ in which the improvement was to be found, though it may be the earliest of which it is positively known. My doubt is due to a magnificent panel-painting which forms, to musicians, the most interesting of the exhibits in Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh. This picture, of which a reproduction is here given* formed one of the 'wings' or 'shutters' of a triptych. The ecclesiastic in a kneeling posture is Sir Edward Bonkil, or Boncle, first Provost [Anglice, Dean] of Trinity College, Edinburgh, and confessor to Mary of Gueldres, by whom the College was built in memory of her husband, James II., who was killed at the siege of Roxburgh Castle in 1460. The triptych seems to have been a votive offering dedicated by Provost Bonkil as an altar-piece in the collegiate church.

The present-day visitor to Edinburgh will search in vain for the original building. It stood where the Waverley Station now is, and what remained when the railway was made was built into the fabric of the present Trinity College Church in Jeffrey Street.

The centre-piece of the triptych has been lost—not even the subject is known. Probably it was destroyed at the Reformation as being idolatrous. The subject of the other panel is the Holy Trinity, Whom, when the panels were closed, the Provost would be seen to be worshipping.

The interest for musicians lies chiefly in the organ, and especially in the very modern type of keyboard represented. It is, indeed, so much like that of to-day that one at once wonders what is the date of the picture.

As to this there can be very little doubt. From historical evidence on other parts of the triptych, 'the composition appears to date not later than 1476, when the King's [James III.] second son was born, also named James, else he, too, would have been included in the group.'† Considerable discussion has taken place as to who painted the picture. But Mr. James L. Caw, Custodian of the Scottish National Gallery, and author of 'Scottish Portraits,' a very high authority, informs me that 'Critical opinion regards them [the panels] as Flemish work and almost certainly by Hugo van der Goes (1435-82). They are supposed to have been commissioned by Sir Edward Bonkil, who is understood to have visited Flanders in person.' There is only one other painting known (the famous Portinari altar-piece at Florence) which is unquestionably by this master. Van der Goes was Dean of the Guild of Painters at Ghent (1473-75); in 1476 he retired to the monastery of Rouge-Clôître, near Brussels, and died in 1482. It is obvious that Provost Bonkil must have taken with him much local material for the historic details of the various panels (five in all, for the two which folded were painted on both sides). Were particulars of some Scottish organ included? If so, Scotland, instead of being behind neighbouring countries in regard to the organ, as has often been too readily assumed, was very considerably ahead of them! For this picture is earlier than the Brunswick organ, already mentioned, by twenty-three years: yet the size of the keys, by comparison with the hand of the angel playing upon them, is hardly distinguishable from that of keys in the present day. If the reverend father did not take with him such details, then the organ may be taken to represent some Flemish instrument, most probably one at Ghent, where the artist is believed to have been born, and spent most of his life.

* See extra Supplement.

† Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart. F.R.S., LL.D., D.C.L., 'Official Guide to Holyrood,' p. 16.

The armorial bearings on the organ-stool are those of Provost Bonkil.

This panel 'is accounted the finest piece of painting in the whole composition.' It is certainly one of the finest of all paintings having a technical interest for musicians, if the present writer, a layman to the brush, may venture an opinion.

It may of course be urged that it is not sound argument to found a conclusion as to the general condition of organ-playing on a painting of a single instrument, even if the picture cited as evidence represents an actual organ, and is not a creation of the artist's fancy. In support of this, reference might be made to the organ depicted fourteen years later (1490) in what is known as the Mallermi Bible (of which we also give an illustration), the keyboard of which is much more primitive. True; but instruments representing different stages of evolution often exist side by side. When an artist avoids contemporary models, he far more often harks back to antiquity for his inspiration than anticipates the mechanical improvements of a future age. And of the two pictures the Mallermi bears much more evidence of the artist having drawn on his fancy than does the Holyrood example, if only because the keyboard is too primitive for the best organs of that period, and it is represented as being out of doors—an unusual position, surely, for an organ of that size. Other points which should not escape notice are:

- (1.) That the player and blower are human beings, not angels, as is so often the case in old carvings and paintings;
- (2.) That the method of blowing is the same in both pictures;
- (3.) That the organ is used in combination with another instrument—the lute. This—so far as my knowledge and memory serve me—makes the Mallermi picture unique. Separate carvings of organs and other instruments are often found as parts of the same design; but I recall no representation in which they are being played simultaneously (the character of the keyed instrument in Georgione's picture of 'The Concert' in the Pitti Gallery at Florence is not very clear, but more suggestive of strings than wind); and

- (4.) That the lute is held with the body of the instrument upwards and the neck downwards, thus reversing the usual practice, making it very uncertain how the weight of the instrument could be supported, and confirming the impression that the artist drew considerably on his imagination.

Clearly, then, the Mallermi Bible illustration cannot be taken as refuting the evidence of the Van der Goes picture and the specific record of the Brunswick organ. In both of these a key could obviously be played by a single finger. I suggest that it was this use of individual digits, and not the use, or freer use, of the thumb, which constituted the manipulative novelty of the late 15th and early 16th centuries, and more than half a century after a picture of a keyboard on which it would be possible had been placed in an Edinburgh church, made Sir John Futhy 'the first new fingerit organeist that ever was in Scotland.'

Occasional Notes

A correspondent sends an inquiry as to the date of publication of the score and parts of Edward German's 'Theme and Six Diversions.' He writes with some impatience, and seems to think that the publishers are in need of prodding. As there may be other readers of the same opinion, we lay before them a few facts to show that so far from being dilatory, the house of Novello has been uncommonly active of late. Since March, 1919—rather less than ten months ago—it has published or put in hand the following important works:

Elgar: Sonata for Violin and Pianoforte; String Quartet, parts and score; Pianoforte Quintet; Violoncello Concerto, arrangement for 'Cello and Pianoforte (full score and parts in the press).

Edward German: Theme and Six Diversions arrangements for Pianoforte Solo, Pianoforte Duet, and parts (full score in the press).

Wagner: 'Parsifal.' Octavo edition, with new English version (over 300 pages).

Francis Macmillan: 'England,' for soli, chorus and orchestra (ready in January).

Cecil J. Sharp: 'Introduction to the Country Dance,' and sets of Folk-Songs from the Appalachian Mountains.

B. J. Dale: 'Two Shakespeare Songs.'

Sir Frederick Bridge: 'A Westminster Pilgrim.'

Dorothy Howell: Symphonic Poem for Orchestra (in the press).

Ernest Bristow Farrar: 'Celtic Suite,' for Violin and Pianoforte (in the press).

Charles Macpherson: A Festival Te Deum and Anthem for Peace Thanksgiving;

besides many smaller choral works, songs, and organ pieces by Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Hugh Blair, Harold Rhodes, Reginald Steggall, Geoffrey Shaw, Harold Darke, A. Herbert Brewer, Edward German, and other composers too numerous to mention.

In view of the difficulties under which publishers are still labouring, this output is one of which the house may reasonably be proud.

It will be seen that Miss Dorothy Howell's 'Lamia' is among the works in the press. Miss Howell is almost certainly the first woman composer who has had an orchestral work performed several times by a leading orchestra while barely out of her 'teens. She will break another record in thus seeing her full score in all the glory of print.

The name of Francis Macmillan, whose choral work 'England' is in the above list, is probably new to the musical public. Mr. Macmillan is a young Canadian composer who was imprisoned at Ruhleben, where 'England' was finished in April, 1918. He has gone to Swinburne for his text, and has produced a work that, by reason of its freshness and virility, seems certain of a warm welcome by our rapidly-reviving choral forces. 'England' will be published early in the present month.

The value of the educational work accomplished during the past five years by the music section of the Y.M.C.A. is so generally recognised that the letter from Sir John McClure (see page 47) should receive sympathetic consideration. There are thousands of ex-soldiers, besides countless employés in munition and other factories, who, thanks chiefly in the Y.M.C.A., have now begun to appreciate fine music that was formerly a sealed book so far as they were concerned. Any project that aims at developing the work thus begun is deserving of the heartiest support, and not least from the musical profession.

From the Fulwell Parish Magazine :

CHRISTMAS DAY.—3 p.m. : Solemn Evensong and Cards.

Owing to a long-standing connection between Bridge and Evensong, the announcement is less startling than it might otherwise be. We have heard, too, of indulgence in a little nap during the sermon. Nevertheless, we think there must be a mistake somewhere.

London Concerts

By ALFRED KALISCH

There has been no slackening in the number of concerts given in London during the period covered by this article, and signs of public satiety have not been wanting. It certainly has been the busiest autumn on record, and particularly noticeable has been the great number of new native artists. That was only what was expected, for one knew many young people were holding back their débûts till Peace had come. The general level has been high, but not many have made any special mark.

One of the events of the month has been the entry into the ranks of regular concert-going bodies of the British Symphony Orchestra, formed and conducted by Mr. Raymond Roze, and consisting of officers and men who have seen active service. It has been heard by the King and Queen; it has a very strong list of naval and military patrons; and is a first-class orchestra, the tone of the strings being particularly full and rich, and the wood-wind conspicuously mellow. Both qualities were shown in the performance at its first concert, on December 12, of the 'Pathetic Symphony.' At the same concert Mr. Cyril Scott conducted his two 'Passacaglias,' founded on Irish airs, which are finely scored and harmonized in the characteristic Scott way. In his 'Idyllic Phantasy' for voice, oboe, and 'cello, Mr. Scott shows great skill in handling unusual combinations of tone-colour, and Miss Astra Desmond, Mr. Foreman, and Mr. Cedric Sharpe sang and played it expressively and picturesquely. Mention should be made, too, of the resuscitation of the Strolling Players Orchestra with a considerable improvement of quality under Mr. Joseph Ivimey. Perhaps resuscitation is hardly the right word, since the Orchestra gave concerts for war objects during the war period. At its first concert, on December 11, it produced Mr. Henry Geel's new Suite, 'Prince Charlie (1745),' which is easy to listen to and tells its story clearly.

At the last of the Queen's Hall Symphony concerts of the year, on November 22, Sir Henry Wood produced Busoni's Sarabande and Cortège from the incidental music to 'Faust.' It is the work of a highly intellectual musician, who, in striving to express too many fine shades of feeling ends by expressing very little. The Sarabande is striking harmonically, but goes on too long and leads nowhere. In the Cortège a feeling of reckless gaiety and foreboding of impending catastrophe is subtly suggested; but here, too, the effect is deadened by the continued dwelling on one emotional note. The composer conducted. Mr. Gustave Holst conducted three movements—'Venus,' 'Mercury,' and 'Jupiter'—from his 'Planets' Suite, most of which was first heard at a Philharmonic concert early last year. The 'Venus' movement was new. It bears the sub-title 'The Bringer of Peace'—which, however, seems an inconclusive peace, with no League of Nations to give it stability. It is the least powerful, in point of imagination, of the series, but like the rest shows a fine sense of rich orchestral colour. The composer made the other two movements sound considerably less dramatic and elemental than did Mr. Boult when he conducted them, but a little more intellectual. In any event, it is a notable work. Signor Busoni played the solo in Mozart's C minor Concerto (K. 491). Expert opinion differed greatly. Some thought his playing masterly because of its intellectuality and dignity—others judged it lacking in spontaneity and charm. I incline to the latter opinion, while admiring the extraordinary finish of the phrasing.

The second Philharmonic concert, on December 4, began with Meyerbeer's 'Struensee' Overture, which sounded strangely obsolete. Mr. Geoffrey Toye did the best for it that could be done. The first hearing of Malipiero's 'Le Pause del Silenzio' had been anticipated with interest. It is a curious work, very pessimistic in outlook and with a certain power of mood painting. The composer strives after economy of means. His score is sometimes empty and bald, and when it is, he obviously means to make us feel uncomfortable. He can produce a good deal of noise characteristically, and he has snatches of sensuous tune, but these he stops quickly, as if rather ashamed of a weakness. It should be said that the work has a 'motto' phrase and seven episodes, each wholly independent and each of the simple form which the text-books designate A B A. The motto comes at the beginning and at the end, and between the episodes. Malipiero does not explain his title. Mr. Toye showed keen insight and sympathy with the music, and had the orchestra well in hand. He also conducted a very crisp and finished performance of Mozart's 'Paris' Symphony (K. 297), with an orchestra reduced to about forty: a wise move.

The London Symphony Orchestra continued its series of 'subject programmes.' The idea is interesting, but after all if a concert is attractive it is more because the music is good and well contrasted than because the subject arouses curiosity. This, however, is too large a matter to be discussed here. The second concert (November 24) contained no actual novelty, but Ravel's Suite, 'La Mère l'Oye,' is not very well known and is an attractive specimen of French musical humour. Holbrooke's 'Queen Mab' made a great impression. The Orchestra is doing great things under Mr. Albert Coates. It surpassed itself at the third concert (December 15) by a wonderful performance of Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony. This work is sixty-five years old, and much of it retains its freshness. It was an astonishing achievement for the 'fifties of last century, and the debt of subsequent composers to it is simply incalculable. Except for Berlioz's experiments in the 'Fantastic' Symphony, Liszt's was the first real attempt in the modern method of parody, and was known to the world at large before its predecessor. No wonder it was the target of endless abuse. Another unfamiliar item in the 'Faust' programme was Roger Ducasse's 'Le Jardin de Marguerite,' which dates from 1912, and is a very pleasing study in nocturnal atmosphere with methods curiously akin to those of our own Delius. But it is somewhat too long. Mr. John Coates sang solos of Boïto and Berlioz admirably.

The rehearsals at the Royal College, under the auspices of the Patron's Fund, have established themselves in public favour, and attract many who are interested in native art. The new scheme of first rehearsing the works and then playing them through adds to the interest. There have been two more of these rehearsals, at which ten works have been tried. Those we are most likely to hear again seem to be the late Ernest Farrar's thoughtful 'Spiritual Studies,' and the well-wrought Symphonies of Harold Darke and Thomas Dunhill. Neither Symphony has, however, yet been heard in full, only movements having been tried so far.

A new Society, the Westminster Choral, was started with excellent promise of future success at the Central Hall on December 2. Mr. Vincent Thomas has trained a strong body of singers up to a high standard. They tried nothing more ambitious than Goring Thomas's 'The Swan and the Skylark,' but there is wisdom in not striving to run before having learnt to walk. The later programmes contain bigger works.

The record of recitals is again bewildering, and again only a few can be mentioned. The pianists seem to have made the most noise (actually and metaphorically) this time. In its way Busoni's playing of the 'Waldstein' Sonata at his recital on December 6 was sensational both in the good and bad sense of the word. It was a very original conception, thought out to the last nuance with a consistency that compels admiration, while also a miracle of nervous energy. But on such things there can be little agreement, and it is hardly strange that some should have said it was quite un-Beethovenish, others that it was the most Beethovenish reading within recent memory. Only on one point is there unanimity: it was remarkable. With Busoni, the relationship between heart and brain constantly shifts—sometimes one dominates, sometimes the other. It is a paradox to say he is unemotional. I overheard a remark in the hall, 'He is just a fearfully brainy man who delights in his own braininess'—but that delight is assuredly a strong emotion. It was this which dominated his reading of Liszt's B minor Sonata. He rioted and revelled in it, and played it at a greater pace than anyone has dared to try, and technically it was marvellous. Moreover there were some moments of rare grandeur and tender beauty, but power and speed were the chief impressions. It was all the more surprising, as at his previous recital we had heard an altogether gentler Busoni.

Mr. Lamond does not vary so much in his moods. He is always sane, strong, and unshakably solid. No brainstorms can quicken or impede his gait or turn him aside a hairsbreadth from his main purpose. These qualities make people flock to his Beethoven recitals with copies of the music and busy pencils. Nor are they wrong, for of such uncompromising stuff was Beethoven himself made—yet not without tenderness, and this tenderness Mr. Lamond does not fail to express. He played three of the biggest Sonatas at Queen's Hall on December 13, and had a large audience.

On the same afternoon, Mr. William Murdoch, newly returned from a very successful tour in Norway, gave a recital at Wigmore Hall. Continental travel, especially when it is successful, is obviously good for artists. Mr. Murdoch comes back with much more vitality and variety in his style, combined with what would appear to be their opposite—a stronger sense of balance and restraint. Thus he played things so different as Bach and Debussy better than ever before.

At her orchestral concert at Queen's Hall on December 1 Miss Isabel Grey, the Scots pianist, showed that she is developing in the right way, and Mr. Anderson Tyrer, at his concert, confirmed the good impression he had made, especially by his playing of the 'Emperor' Concerto. Lastly, a word of praise to Miss Betty Goodden for her very neat and charming playing of a very adroitly-selected group of short humorous pieces by modern men.

The number of new singers has been very large: Mr. Moses Mirsky, a young baritone of exceptional refinement, Mr. John Goss, a thoughtful singer, Mr. Johnstone Douglas, also with a fine instinct for interpretation, Mr. Harold Williams, an Australian baritone of great promise, and Mr. John Notley deserve special mention amongst the men. Of the ladies, Miss Godson made the best impression among many of unusual promise.

Of singers already well-known, M. Vladimir Rosing continues to impress large audiences by his well-chosen programmes and unusual gifts of interpretation. The recital of Miss Maggie Teyte, on December 4, delighted lovers of delicate art, especially her singing of modern French songs. Miss Phyllis Lett, at her orchestral concert, sang music of all schools with distinguished breadth of style and conviction, and was specially good in Erda's warning from 'Rheingold.' She introduced two interesting songs by the young but already well-known composer, Miss Dorothy Howell. Miss Anne Thursfield is establishing her position as an exceptionally clever and versatile singer. Miss Gladys Newberry deserves credit for including Brahms's Quartets in her programme and for securing an excellent ensemble.

There is not much to record in the way of Chamber Music. The Classical Concert Society has contented itself with familiar things, and the London Chamber Concert Society repeated Elgar's Quartet and Quintet at its last concert. The works seem assured of a permanent place in the repertoire. The newly-formed Harmonic Trio promises to do good work, and in the way of ensemble music there is nothing more satisfying to record than the playing of Sonatas for pianoforte and violoncello by Mr. Harold Samuel and Mr. Ivor James (December 11). In the Sonatas by Frank Bridge and Jean Huré they found the happiest inspiration.

OPERA IN LONDON

By FRANCIS E. BARRETT

THE BEECHAM SEASON

GILBERT AND SULLIVAN AND OTHER EXAMPLES

In order to complete the record of operatic performances in London I must go back to the production of Wagner's 'Parsifal,' which I merely noted at the close of last month's article. That production represented yet another phase of the history of the work, a history which begins with the composer's refusal to allow performances of it anywhere but at Bayreuth. It was Angelo Neumann who said he had 'lost millions' when Wagner begged him to withdraw his request to include it in the repertoire of the 'Wandering Wagnerian' Company. 'Never' is a long day, as Wagner himself discovered before his own long day closed. Was it not Hanslick who discerned in this very 'Parsifal' the death song of the composer whose demise he, at an early date, prophesied after the first production of the sacred music-drama?

In its English version the work takes a new lease of life. It is curious that the very nation to whom operas on sacred subjects have been so long denied should show such keen appreciation. Witness the approval extended to 'Samson and Delilah' and to 'Parsifal.' Of the merits of the work it is late to speak at this time of day. A portion of its music has been made familiar to everyone by Sir Henry Wood's consistent and persistent performances on many successive Good Fridays. It is to be noted in passing that the music assumes an entirely fresh complexion when heard in the theatre, a fact that may or may not account for the approval with which the performance of 'Parsifal' has been received. As to its representation on the stage there are divided opinions on its desirability. Naturally the attitude differs in this country, which as a whole is not Roman Catholic and where mystic symbolism is mostly absent from religious observances. The mission of the work is to teach, and to illustrate once more the struggle between good and evil. To what extent it is successful is a matter of opinion. Personally I think Wagner carried his point to much better effect in 'Lohengrin,' 'Tannhäuser,' and 'The Flying Dutchman.'

At the moment the record to be made in connection with it is the nature of its representation by British singers. There is no question that it was remarkably successful. For this there is clear reason, to be found in the fact that the British exponents gave their own construction and their own version unconcerned with any 'tradition' or memory of how so-and-so did it. This, I may say in passing, is one of the greatest pleas for an opera of our own, for in representing the foreign matter there is not only the fact that it is, as a rule, something typical of a race alien to us, but there is also the ever-present memory of how somebody else sang it. Those who saw Dr. Ethel Smyth's 'The Boatswain's Mate' will possibly recall the spontaneity and conviction of its presentation. No wonder the composer describes her British cast as being 'ideal.' Every cast would be 'ideal' if its members had to deal with matter so well understood as Mr. Jacobs's story and characterisation.

Without being ideal, the cast of 'Parsifal' distinguished itself for the reason, as stated, that each member put his own construction on the work. The outstanding figure was the Gurnemanz of Mr. Norman Allin. He has the right type of voice and the proper dignity of style, so there was nothing wanting. The Parsifal was Mr. Frank Mullings, who by adopting a plan of broad contrasts imparted the necessary diversity in representing first the 'Guileless fool' and afterwards the one to whom knowledge has come. At later stages Mr. Walter Hyde took the part with all the conviction so admirable an artist could give to it. Miss Gladys Ancrum was faced with a difficult task in representing Kundry. Musically and histrionically the part is one of immense difficulty. She did not probe very deeply into its subtleties, and hardly expressed the attitude of one obeying the behest of the evil Klingsor; but in vocal effect there was little lacking, and it was generally a commendable representation of a part that people of greater experience and wider means have found difficult. One of the best-acted parts was Mr. Percy Heming's Amfortas. His singing also was good up to a point when, at the first performance, he seemed to become the victim of his own emotion. Mr. Herbert Langley's Klingsor was a wholly individual piece of work. The character is dangerously near the pantomime demon, and Mr. Langley did not make any particular effort to define the line of demarcation. In general details the performance was excellent. The choral singing in the Hall of the Grail was particularly good, and the Flower Maidens sang with animation and freshness. The guiding spirit of it all was Mr. Albert Coates, who conducted, and proved to be an important factor. The panorama was omitted. I know the difficulties of fitting it into the music are great, but I cannot imagine why the cinematograph was not used.

RUSSIAN OPERA

In the following fortnight the undertaking gave its attention to Russian opera, producing in turn Moussorgsky's 'Khovantchina' and 'Boris Godounov.' Neither of these is strange to the company, which made the slack performance of 'Khovantchina' all the more remarkable. It is chiefly a 'choral' opera, as the Russians showed in unmistakable fashion when they gave it in 1913. In view of the good repute of the British operachorus, I fully expected to hear as good, if not better singing. I was grievously disappointed; the whole performance in fact was disappointing, in spite of some good work from Mr. Norman Allin and Mr. Webster Millar. Miss Edna Thornton, the Marfa, was not at home in her part, and the casting of the other characters was in every respect ill-advised. Happily, the company seemed to realise the errors of its way in time—they were certainly very clearly pointed out in the daily Press—and gave closer attention to the performance of 'Boris Godounov.' In this there was a general stiffening up all round. For the first time this season everyone articulated his words distinctly (the sine qua non in opera in English), there was closer attention to detail, and no one stumbled except Dimitri's white horse in the Coronation Scene. Certain portions which had been ruthlessly cut out were restored, and the low comedy transports of the Friars were considerably modified, to the gain in dignity. As Boris, Mr. Norman Allin appeared in a rather new type of character, for which his smooth flowing methods did not seem altogether suited, though there were many good points in his reading. Mr. Walter Hyde made an admirable Dimitri, distinguishing himself with Miss Edna Thornton, the Marina, in the curiously Italian-opera-like duet. Mr. Maurice d'Oisly's Chusky stood out as being well within his means, and everyone, including chorus and orchestra, was well up to his work, and kept to it in gratifying fashion by Mr. Albert Coates. The performance was the best the company has given of any of its operas.

MR. DE LARA'S 'NAIL'

There has been much talk about 'English opera' in connection with this season, and appeals by various means, including a fancy ball, have been made on behalf of 'English opera.' Yet only one example has been given. This was Mr. Isidore de Lara's 'Nail.' As an English operatic composer Mr. de Lara has won his spurs on the Continent with several works. So far as London is concerned his record consists of 'The Light of Asia,' a cantata turned opera, and 'Amy Robsart.' In France and elsewhere he has achieved a reputation with several more works. Therefore he comes with an acknowledged position. It is much to be feared that the Continent must regard the British opera composer as a somewhat characterless individual with a style of eloquence but no great reason. To British ears it is not a particularly attractive style—rather the reverse—and British audiences will never forgive Mr. de Lara for his ballet music, which in no way suggests a dance, Oriental or insular. Colour is not wanting in the score, and at points it is more realistic than convincing. The mounting was of the most gorgeous order, but this was the result of the exercise of arts other than those of the composer or singer. The cast was the same as before, yet neither Miss Rosina Buckman, the Nail, nor Mr. Mullings, the Hadyar, seemed to get quite into their parts, and Mr. Percy Heming's Emir was at best sketchy. The opera, which Sir Thomas Beecham conducted, was given again during the last week.

The presentation of the new and revised edition of Delius's 'A Village Romeo and Juliet' having been abandoned, the only other British work seen during the season was Mr. Granville Bantock's 'Pierrot of the Minute,' which was given as a ballet devised by M. Gavrilov. Why this should have been done is not quite clear. The composer has just completed in his 'Pan' a work designed for stage performance, but instead is represented by a garbled version of the poem which inspired his 'Pierrot.' The score was presented in full under the composer's direction, but the 'story' devised for the purpose of the ballet was chiefly remarkable for the success with which it missed the points of Dowson's charming poem and Mr. Bantock's clever music.

Other matters of note have been the appearance of M. Dinh Gilly, the Algerian singer familiar to frequenters of the Grand Syndicate's performances. He made highly successful efforts as Tonio in 'Pagliacci,' as Scarpia in 'La Tosca,' and his presence was promised in 'Nail' but did not materialise. M. Gilly's enunciation of our tongue in song was notably clear and correct. Finally, at a date too late for notice—on the last night but two of the season—a revival of Bizet's early 'Djamileh' was announced after a silence of twenty-six years.

LIGHT OPERA

In the field of light opera there has been a welcome amount of movement during the month. The Gilbert and Sullivan performances at the Prince's Theatre have continued to attract, their drawing powers being augmented rather than diminished by the addition of 'The Yeomen of the Guard.' As with 'Patience,' which preceded it, the present-day audience took to it greedily. 'Patience' proved anything but pointless, for the British public love satire, especially of the neat and well-sharpened order provided by Gilbert. Miss Bertha Lewis and Mr. Lytton distinguished themselves. Like approval was accorded 'The Yeomen of the Guard,' which came like oil on troubled waters to those whose wish for light music is not met by musical comedy or revue. The audience took the keenest delight in a thoroughly good performance. The fact that its character is more serious than those of the other works as yet given seemed a help to its exponents, who attained a level of excellence that I have not seen in light opera for many years. Mr. Lytton's Jack Point was individual, Miss Sybil Cecil a very charming Elsie who could touch pathos without floundering in it; Mr. Leo Sheffield a Shadbolt with a style of his own; Mr. Derek Oldham, the Fairfax; Miss Bertha Lewis the Dame Carruthers; Miss Nellie Briercliffe the Phoebe; Mr. Frederick Hobbs and others contributing, and Mr. Geoffrey Toye directing as usual with much sympathy.

As in 'Patience' there was entirely new dressing and scenery, both productions being far removed from the reproach Gilbert cast on the 1908 revivals, and being of a kind that is likely to have a very considerable and much needed influence upon the light opera question generally.

Something of its influence has already got to work, and at the Ambassador's Theatre has been seen this month a production definitely styled 'light opera.' It is entitled 'Sylvia's Lovers,' and is the work of Mr. Cosmo Gordon Lennox and Mr. Bernard Rolt. The music of the latter does not reveal the possession of sufficient resource to carry out the good intentions he undoubtedly possesses. His tunes, like his lyrics, begin well and then trail off into flippancy of word and familiarity of cadence. Some good orchestration—exemplary in its way for the effect it gets from a very small body of players—does not compensate for this lack of originality as a whole. Miss Desirée Ellinger uses her vocal means to good purpose in the chief part, and Mr. Patrick Byrne and Mr. Pitt Chatham put in sound work, while the comedy, of a somewhat heavily underlined kind, is supplied by Miss Betty Chester and Mr. Joe Nightingale. Mr. Howard Carr conducts.

On the other hand there can be nothing but praise for the 'musical extravaganza,' 'Prince Ferelon,' written and composed by Mr. Nicholas Gatty, which was produced by the Etlinger School. The idea is simple, for it is of the lover who tries various means for pleasing his lady-love; but in the various types of song and the different sorts of dances Mr. Gatty covers a very wide field. He meets the requirements with uncommon skill, always writing with conviction, often with humour, and invariably with a knowledge and address that makes one lament that the only outlet for such ability is in work of this kind, and makes me rather question the good faith of those who shout so loudly about 'English opera.' Let me record that Mr. Gatty's piece, which was played for four nights, was well done. Miss Gladys Moger's voice told admirably on the stage, and Mr. W. Johnstone Douglas gave effective aid in the principal parts. There was a good chorus, graceful dancers, and an eminently satisfactory account of the score under the composer's hand by the Rosabel Watson Orchestra.

BRITISH OPERA

THE TRAGEDY OF A BLACK BOX

Under the above heading the following letter appeared in The Times of December 4, and is reprinted by kind permission of Dr. Ethel Smyth:

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE TIMES'

SIR,—In an article in The Times of November 29, entitled 'Supporting British Opera,' with much of which I am in warm sympathy, the writer, while endeavouring to account for the failure of British composers to hold the operatic stage, mentions among factors necessary to success (1) public enthusiasm, (2) the verdict of the Press—both depending, of course, upon the style of production.

I propose to analyse elsewhere, at some length, the whole position of opera in England, about which there are intricacies that other analysts have not mentioned. Here—with apologies for what is a ridiculous situation, also with an appeal to the reader's indulgence, and more particularly to his sense of humour—I will only venture to trace the course of one British opera—namely, my own 'Boatswain's Mate,' concerning which your Correspondent states that the attitude of the public towards it 'was, generally speaking, one of tolerance.' Subsequently he bestows a little kindly gilding on this pill—but let us leave it at that.

I will take up my tale at the moment when, after two-and-a-half years' seclusion in a cupboard (following upon what he allows was a promising start), 'The Boatswain's Mate' was revived this year. Revived, I may add, after much persuasion on the part of a strong supporter of Sir Thomas Beecham's, to which he good-naturedly yielded. Legitimate pride triumphing over modesty innate and ingrained, I should have pleasure in showing your Correspondent his own and scores of other Press notices on this event. My summing up in my diary—a dangerously truthful work—is: 'B.M. admittedly a wild success; even The Times, not always favourable to me, admits it! Glory!!' The house, so Sir Thomas and others informed me, for I was not present myself, was crammed, and it was the same at a second performance, which took place a few weeks later. (This is an honour reserved, as a rule, for British composers only—possibly in order to stimulate curiosity. But it militates against a smooth and convincing production.)

'The Boatswain's Mate' then went to Manchester, where again, the number 2 being evidently of mystical import in these cases, it was again given twice, an interval once more elapsing between the two events. Again a wonderful Press. Further, an unsolicited written testimonial from the manager, to the effect that it had created such enthusiasm that I might count on 'frequent performances, both in the provinces and in London.'

After this—nothing! In the following London season, however, this being part of the undertaking given to his friend, Sir Thomas again played the opera to a crowded house on the opening night of the season. Press as before.

(One illustrated daily went so far as to say:—'English opera has now come into its own; at the performance of "The Boatswain's Mate" Princess Patricia, who was present, wore gauzy black.') Then six long weeks elapsed, and not till then did the sacred second performance, at which I was present, take place. There had been no orchestral rehearsal, and I was deeply impressed by the skill with which Mr. Goossens shepherded his naturally bewildered flock; also touched by the apologies offered by singers and members of the orchestra encountered in corridors. But before all was I amazed at the applause lavished on a production that certainly did high credit to British presence of mind and resource. And on this, as on the other occasions, the house was full (not of 'paper,' so those best qualified to know assured me!).

All this time a zealous Press-cutting bureau had been sending me entrancing extracts from various provincial newspapers, expressing a hope that they might now see 'The Boatswain's Mate.' Since then the Beecham Company has been touring indefatigably, and it is perhaps owing to exorbitant railway charges that a certain heavy black box I know of, containing music, was left in London. These things are mysteries. But the facts of the case are that a work which, if one may believe the evidence of one's senses, did find favour both with Press and public, has been played exactly six times in three years! Meanwhile the pall of silence descends—first impressions are forgotten—'another British failure!' Curtain.

But at long last a gleam of light illumines this tragedy of a black box: a call from across the water; a sepulchre opened; a huge parcel sent off to Vienna! And at this moment 'The Boatswain's Mate' is booked for four German opera houses, and 'The Wreckers' for Munich!

What really is a tragedy is the fact that nowhere in Europe shall I find as ideal a cast for the former as I have had in England.

ETHEL SMYTH
(Mus. Doc.).

Dr. Smyth's letter received very speedy endorsement in an interview with Mr. Isidore de Lara published in the Sunday Evening Telegram of December 7. The interview was headed 'The English Musician Abroad.' We extract a few passages bearing on the operatic question:

I am one of those English musicians—the other two being Delius and Ethel Smyth—whose operatic work is played on the Continent, and who have, indeed, had furnished them there the opportunities that are denied operatic writers at home. If I quote my own career, it is because I know that best, and can drive home my points about a cause I have dearly at heart—the establishment of a school of English—or, if you prefer, British—opera.

As far back as 1892 I wrote a cantata on Sir Edwin Arnold's great poem, 'The Light of Asia,' which was done at Covent Garden. That led to Augustus Harris commissioning me to write an opera, 'Amy Robsart,' produced at Covent Garden in 1893, and given for one performance only. It is that one performance only, or perhaps two or three, at most, that is the point I want to consider. English opera turns upon it.

Let me first, however, emphasise that I am not questioning the fate of 'Amy Robsart,' or speaking from a narrow, personal standpoint. I have long outgrown that. The disappointment led to my leaving England for France, where that particular work has been repeatedly given at different opera houses throughout the country.

FIRST NIGHT FAILURES

Since then I have written 'Moïna,' first given at Monte Carlo; 'Messaline' (Monte Carlo); 'Sanga' (Opéra Comique, Paris); 'Solea' (Cologne); 'Naïl' (Gaité Lyrique, Paris); and 'Les Trois Masques' (Marseilles). Some of these have taken permanent places in the repertory of French opera houses, as also in those of Belgium. . . . Now as to the half-hearted trials given to new operas here. It is impossible for anyone, no matter how trained a critic, to judge an opera fairly at one hearing. There is far too much to consider. Again, the public are strangely incurious about a new opera. It doesn't attract, from sheer novelty, does as a new play. There is none of the first night fever about it.

It is only by repeated hearing that a new work can make way; and that means confidence on the part of the management—and money to back that confidence. Let me quote a few instances of operas successful to-day—successful, I mean, not only artistically, but financially. 'Butterfly' met so hostile a reception on its presentation at the Scala, Milan, that the opera was withdrawn after the first performance. 'Carmen' was a rank failure at first, and poor Bizet died before it became a success. 'The Barber,' 'Faust,' and ever so many others I could name all fell down at the start. If, therefore, English opera is to be established, our habit of wanting a winner straightway must be relegated to limbo.

After considering the question of endowment, both private and State, Mr. de Lara adds:

There is perhaps one other chance: the establishment of very big theatres at popular prices. I am a great believer in the love and appreciation of good music shown by the people.

We believe that in the long run the solution of this and kindred musical questions lies in the democratic direction.

Choral Notes and News

By W. MCNAUGHT

A new 'choral problem' seems to have arisen for the bewilderment of choral conductors—the problem of man-power. The evidence of its urgency is visible and audible at every choral concert. It is of course nothing new to see the women vastly outnumbering the men, but the brave little groups of tenors that used to battle successfully with superior odds tend now to dwindle hopelessly out of the combat, and the basses follow closely behind in this reduction of personnel. The cause is only too well-known, though the theorist may still speculate for further reasons in the roving habits learnt during years of open-air living. The question is: How to meet the new conditions? Recent experience of concert-going in the London area shows that conductors are trying to make the best of a bad job and are putting up with the top-heaviness of choral tone and the frequent inaudibility of their third line. If only the musical effect is considered it would be better to reduce the number of sopranos and contraltos (a drastic weeding-out would do no harm in certain cases)—a hard-hearted business from which many conductors would shrink appalled, so strongly does the social and personal element enter into choral society composition. But if choral singing is to be given its true dignity as an art-form this question of balance should be approached without restraint, and if sentimental barriers are not too firm the strong line should be taken. Recently a new body—the Westminster Choral Society—has appeared in London. At its very first concert the balance was altogether one-sided. One may question the wisdom of admitting so many sopranos and contraltos while tenor entries were so few. One can easily understand the desire to impress the public by force of numbers and brilliance of tone (a good soprano lead goes a long way with the British public at choral concerts), and at the same time regret that the artistic satisfaction of a good balance had to take second place. No doubt there are many conductors who would, if they could, make the sacrifice of numbers for the sake of proportion. They should be among the first to realise the mistake of supposing that weight of tone is the chief factor in making an impressive effect. It is a matter of common experience that a large choir and orchestra, with full organ thrown in, can pound away forte and fortissimo for page after page and produce only dullness, while a small well-trained choir, thinly accompanied or not at all, can electrify an audience. It depends more upon the skilful moulding of the tone and on the way in which a climax is built up than on the mere degree of loudness. It is difficult for a choir to adapt its constitution to an artistic principle, and the difficulty in this case is aggravated by the modern tendency to score for a symphony orchestra in writing a choral work, often with essential parts for 'luxury' instruments. This means a full complement of wind, and the strings have to be numerous or ineffective. The result is a performance by fifty or sixty instrumentalists and a female-voice choir, say a hundred and fifty strong. There are few mixed-voice choral works that can 'come off' under these conditions. But think of the wonderful things that can be done by twenty sopranos, twenty contraltos, twenty tenors, and twenty basses, and an orchestra of thirty—if only composers and conductors knew!

THE WESTMINSTER CHORAL SOCIETY

The first concert of this Society, referred to above, took place at Central Hall on December 2. The choral singing was surprisingly good, the balance alone being at fault. Mr. Vincent Thomas has evidently the right instincts and abilities for his work. The unity in detail led to telling expressiveness, good phrasing, and nicely-managed rhythm, that one does not look for in a newly-formed body of London singers. These qualities appeared at the outset in Elgar's simple unaccompanied part-song, 'Peace, gentle peace.' In the choral works that followed—Stanford's 'Last Post' and Goring Thomas's 'The swan and the skylark'—the orchestra took a large share of the interest, and supported the singing tone and harmony, but the test of choral powers was less searching than in the simple opening number. The choir's abilities were still apparent, and the tone of the female voices was particularly satisfying. It remains to add the names of the solo singers—Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Astra Desmond, Mr. Herbert Cave, Mr. Ian MacRobert, and Mr. Topliss Green; and of the organist, Mr. J. A. Meale.

THE ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY

The second of the season's concerts, given at the Royal Albert Hall on November 29, was musically interesting. It was pleasant to renew acquaintance with Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' and to enjoy its melodiousness. Here is no inarticulate striving and emotional floundering. The idiom is made to the stature of the pathetic little story of Alfred Noyes's poem. There is consistency and unity in the general design, and both the choral and orchestral writing show the hand of experience. The Royal Choral Society, to whom the music was not unfamiliar, gave a creditable account of the work under Sir Frederick Bridge's direction. Their tone-quality was always pleasing, and the intonation always secure. Parry's characteristic setting of Browning's 'The pied Piper of Hamelin' followed, the choral programme being completed with Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah.' An item that proved extremely popular was a pleasing orchestral march by Percy Fletcher, entitled 'The Spirit of Pageantry,' which was performed under the composer's direction. The solo singers of the concert were Miss Flora Woodman, Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL

The prospects of the forthcoming Handel Festival, to be held at the Crystal Palace on June 19, 22, 24, and 26, seem to be satisfactory, although there is room for speedier recruiting of choral singers. As the last Festival was held as far back as 1912, there has been a certain break in the tradition that kept the ranks of enthusiasts—both in choir and audience—up to full numbers, and Mr. Walter Hedgcock, who is again musical director, anticipates a harder task than usual in maintaining the pre-war standard. It is to be hoped that the organizers' appeal for choral singers will be readily supported, for the Handel Festival movement can play an important part in shaping the nation's musical habits. Its influence can only be stabilizing and salutary in the formation of taste.

The conductor of the Festival is again Sir Frederic Cowen. The programme will probably be as follows: June 19, general rehearsal; June 22, 'Judas Maccabæus'; June 24, selection from 'Israel in Egypt'; June 26, 'Messiah.'

It is interesting to note that the famous organ is being rebuilt and modernized, with a lower pitch.

Another welcome revival is the South Wales Musical Festival, which is to be held in the spring at Swansea, Neath, Mountain Ash, and Newport, and perhaps two other towns in order to complete a full week. A committee under the Presidency of Lord Howard de Walden is at work in London completing the arrangements. It is hoped, in connection with this Festival, to found a permanent Welsh National Orchestra. The South Wales Festival was inaugurated in 1913, and held for the second time in 1914.

OTHER CONCERTS

Plentiful news of choral concerts is given elsewhere under the heading 'Music in the Provinces.' Information is also to hand of the following events which do not come within the purview of local correspondents:

BROMLEY.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was given by the Bromley Choral Society at the Central Hall on December 9, with Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Frederick Blamey, and Mr. George Uttley as soloists. The choral singing did credit to Mr. Frederic Fertel's conductorship.

FOLKESTONE.—On November 26 the concert-arrangement of German's 'Merrie England' was given in the Town Hall by the Philharmonic Society, under the able and experienced conductorship of Mr. F. E. Fletcher. The Society, in spite of many difficulties, 'carried on' quietly during the war, and happily the chorus is as large as it has ever been, and quite as efficient. The hall was crowded, so Mr. Fletcher and his forces may be congratulated, not only on a very excellent performance, which was greatly enjoyed, but on receiving the hearty support of the townspeople. The principals were Miss Beatrice Hughes Pope, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Walter Glynne, and Mr. Edward Beaumont, all of whom were received with enthusiasm. An orchestra of about thirty players provided an adequate accompaniment.

LETCHWORTH.—The first choral concert in this town since the outbreak of war was given in December by the Philharmonic Society. Under Mr. H. Gomersall's direction the band and chorus of a hundred gave a performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf' which reached a very creditable standard considering the number of new members in the choir. The orchestra played its part usefully, and good work was done by the soloists, Miss Louise Trenton and Mr. Frank Webster. Other items in the programme were Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture, and violoncello playing by Miss Dora Petherick.

LINCOLN.—The Lincoln Musical Society, of which Dr. G. J. Bennett, organist of the Cathedral, is the moving spirit, gave a highly successful concert in the Corn Exchange on December 3. Active operations of the Society had been suspended during the war, except for assistance given by members of the choir at special Cathedral services, and this re-appearance in full force aroused great interest. The programme included 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The death of Minnehaha,' which were given with vivacity, sympathy, and clear utterance, and Elgar's unaccompanied part-song, 'Weary wind of the West.' Great pleasure was derived from the choral singing; also from the work of Mr. John Booth and Captain Herbert Heyner as soloists. Orchestral numbers included the 'Peer Gynt' Suite.

MELBOURNE.—An Elgar programme was given by the Melbourne Philharmonic Society at the Town Hall on October 22, under Mr. Alberto Zelman's direction. It consisted of the setting of Psalm 29 (Op. 74) for chorus and orchestra, Sursum Corda (Op. 11) for strings, brass, and organ, the complete cycle of 'The Spirit of England,' 'Chanson de nuit' and 'Chanson de matin' for small orchestra, and 'The Banner of St. George.'

NEWPORT.—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Arthur E. Sims, gave a concert on December 4 with 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and a selection from 'Parsifal,' as principal items in the programme. The choral singing earned high praise, and a good standard was maintained by the solo singing of Miss Ida Cooper, Miss Mabel Corran, Miss Gladys Peel, Mr. Edward Davies, and Mr. Walter Saul.

WOKING.—On November 15 the Musical Society gave an Armistice celebration concert with a miscellaneous programme that represented the music of the Allied countries. The choral numbers consisted of the Soldiers' Chorus from 'Faust,' Smart's Te Deum, Arcadelt's 'Ave Maria'—an excellent choice—and Elgar's 'Land of Hope and Glory,' with Miss Evelyn Rodman as soloist. The choir sang with good effect under the direction of Mr. Patrick White.

Programmes have come to hand of the concerts given by Childe Okeford and District Choral Class (Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George,' conducted by Mr. T. A. Bevis) on November 26; and by Hexham Gentlemen's Glee Club on December 5 (Brahms's 'Rhapsody' and William Wallace's 'The Massacre of Macpherson,' conducted by Mr. N. S. Wallbank).

Church and Organ Music

NEW CHURCH MUSIC

Office of the Holy Communion, in G, by H. A. Chambers; Office of the Holy Communion, in A, by Harold Rhodes; 'Good King Wenceslas,' (S.A.T.B.), by Geoffrey Shaw; 'The Nativity,' a carol, by Harold Rhodes.

(Novello & Co., Ltd.)

In his setting of the Holy Communion Service in G, Mr. Chambers has provided music of a tuneful, straightforward character, well adapted to meet the needs of those places where the resources of the choir are limited, or where only simple music is wanted. There are frequent unison passages, and the harmonized portions are quite easy to sing. A note by the composer suggests that, if necessary, the Service may be sung throughout by sopranos only. As a good deal of the thematic material of the Creed is made use of in the Gloria, the music could be quickly picked up by the congregation.

Mr. Rhodes's work is of a more ambitious character. He has clearly endeavoured to avoid well-worn paths, and to write music that shall be interesting and effective without being too elaborate. There is practically nothing in the shape of complex, contrapuntal writing, the composer relying mainly on massive harmonic effects and a liberal use of modulation. As this is a setting which, by its freshness of treatment, will probably appeal to a good many organists and choirs, perhaps a few quotations will be found interesting.

Ex. 1 is a passage the general features of which—outline of melody, and, to a certain extent, key arrangement—appear more than once in the Creed. The crotchet figure in the pedal part is made use of both in the Creed and the Gloria:

Ex. 1. $\text{♩} = 80.$

ve - ry God . . of f ve - ry God ve - ry God . .
 Light, ve - ry
 ve - ry God, Be - got - ten, not made of ve - ry God, Be - got - ten, not . . made
 . . . of ve - ry God, . . Be - got - ten, not made
 God of ve - ry God, . . Be - got - ten, not made &c.

In Ex. 2 will be noted the pedal figure mentioned above, now appearing as a melody in the organ part, and also a characteristic bit of modulation:

Ex. 2.

 And was in - car - nate
Gt. (or Ch.) soft 16 ft. & 8 ft.
Man. Sw. soft 8 ft. & 4 ft.

Ex. 3 shows this figure now transferred to the bass of the accompaniment:

Ex. 3.

He suf - fer - ed, and pp Sw.
Ped. 16 & 8 ft.

Some highly effective choral writing follows at 'And the third day,' which is very appropriately made use of again later on for 'And I look for the resurrection of the dead.'

Very striking, though simple, is the opening of the Sanctus. At the words 'Heaven and earth are full' the voices enter imitatively over massive organ chords, and an imposing climax is reached:

Ex. 4.

earth are full . . .
 full, are full heaven and earth . . are full ' of Thy Glo - ry, &c.
 Glo - ry,
 f cres. Full. &c.

The Benedictus begins with a descending sequence of changing harmonies on a tonic pedal, the voices entering after the style of the first two bars of the Sanctus. Several bars of pure diatonic vocal work follow, unaccompanied, providing an effective relief from the chromatic organ passage which precedes it, and which is resumed at its close. 'Hosanna in the highest' (in 6-8 time, vivace) provides the choir with some very effective phrases—largely unaccompanied—punctuated by outbursts from the organ. The organist with some good reeds at his disposal will be happy here.

The Agnus Dei is planned on quiet lines. There is some smooth, flowing writing for the voices, and an expressive organ part. In excellent contrast with the other movements, there are no excursions into remote keys.

The opening and closing sections of the Gloria, the musical material of which is largely the same, contain a good deal of bold, straightforward writing, with some interesting modulation. An expressive middle section and an imposing Coda contribute to the making of a highly effective movement.

It should be added that throughout the work variety is secured by frequent unaccompanied passages, which are almost invariably straightforward and diatonic in style. That the composer realises the effect obtainable by the use of simple diatonic harmonies may be seen from the settings of the 'Kyrie Eleison'—four in number—which are models in that respect. For example, the first is composed entirely of simple triads, all in root position; there are no discords, no passing-notes, and no accidentals.

Altogether, Mr. Rhodes has produced a setting which will cause future work of his to be received with interest.

Mr. Geoffrey Shaw's arrangement of 'Good King Wenceslas,' for S.A.T.B. (unaccompanied) contains some interesting treatment. The parts of the king and the page, assigned to tenor and soprano voices, are supported by a humming accompaniment, frequently of an imitative character. Towards the end, running quaver passages are vocalized on 'Ah.' The transition from the third to the fourth verse is cleverly managed, and in the hands of a good choir should be most effective. The final verse provides opportunities for some rich, broad effects, the last three bars being marked fff, with soprano, tenor, and bass parts divided.

'The Nativity,' a carol, by Harold Rhodes, is an excellent specimen of this class of composition. It is in true carol style, and the spirit of the quaint, simple words of Ben Jonson is faithfully reflected in the music. Though the music of the three verses is the same, the varying expression of the words has been very happily brought out by slight variations of treatment.

GEORGE GRACE.

'ISRAEL IN EGYPT' AT THE ABBEY

The choir which Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson has recently formed for special musical services at Westminster Abbey gave its first performance on December 8, when 'Israel in Egypt' was sung with orchestral accompaniment. The choir, about two hundred in number, proved itself an excellent body, and was listened to by a congregation which completely filled the Abbey.

On September 28 Mr. Harold Jones completed twenty-five years' service as organist and choirmaster of Ashburton Parish Church. The anniversary was commemorated by an organ recital given by Mr. Jones on October 22.

Under the auspices of the Church Music Society, of which Lady Mary Trefusis is hon. secretary, a series of hymn festivals was held in Cornwall during October. Mr. Geoffrey Shaw was the conductor, and demonstrated that the objects of the Society were to make known hymns and tunes that are rarely sung, and to promote and raise the standard of congregational singing. Country church choirs and congregations from several districts assembled at convenient centres, and after lectures and training by Mr. Shaw the singing rose to a high standard and had thrilling effect. It is confidently expected that the holding of these festivals will promote the choice of good hymns and tunes, and a participation by congregations in the worship song of the Church.

Choir Festival Services were held at the Central Mission (Halifax Place Chapel), Nottingham, on November 16. The music included Stanford's 'Te Deum in B flat,' Parker's 'In heavenly love abiding,' and Allitsen's 'Like a hart.' Madame Ethel Parkin was the soloist. In the afternoon Part I of 'Elijah' was given by an augmented choir under the direction of Mr. E. M. Barber. The soloists were Madame Gladys Webster, Madame Ethel Parkin, Mr. Herbert Gutteridge, and Mr. Joseph Asher. Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson was the organist.

A musical recital was held at All Saints' Church, Southampton, on November 19, when Glazounov's 'Theme and Variations,' and Introduction and Fugue in C for String Quartet, also Quartets by Dvorák and Kalinnikov, were played by Mr. Gotch, Mr. F. W. Trott, Mr. F. Long, and Mr. L. A. Ladbroke. The choir sang anthems by Gounod and Armes, and César Franck's 'Hallelujah.' O praise ye the Lord.' Mr. Ladbroke played violoncello solos by Marcello and Scarlatti.

At Derby Road Baptist Church, Nottingham, on November 23, a selection from 'Messiah' was sung by an augmented choir under the conductorship of Mr. J. F. Blasdale, organist of the Church. The soloists were Madame Woodward, Miss Margaret Walker, Mr. L. C. Pearce, and Mr. Harold Glover. Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson was the organist.

At Richmond Road Congregational Church, Cardiff, two musical services in commemoration of the choir anniversary were held on November 23. The choir sang the Hallelujah Chorus, Mendelssohn's 'As the hart pants,' and anthems by Gounod and Walford Davies. Mr. W. J. Robins gave an organ recital. Prof. Walford Davies delivered an address at both services, speaking on 'Music and Worship,' and 'Music and National Life.'

At Exeter, on December 13, Dr. W. G. Alcock gave a recital, one of a series of events arranged by Mr. Lancelot Holden, organist of the Mint Church. Dr. Alcock's programme included the Introduction and Fugue of Reubke's '94th Psalm,' Guilman's first Sonata, and music by Dvorák, Dubois, Rachmaninoff, Faulkes, and Mozart.

Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was sung by the Oratorio Choir in St. Austell Parish Church on December 11. The soloists were Madame Samina Farish, Miss Amy Blight, Mr. Will Foster, and Mr. Sydney Smith. There was a large congregation. The performance was under the direction of Mr. W. Brennan Smith, who presided at the organ.

The fifth annual carol recital in aid of the funds of St. Dunstan's Home for Blinded Soldiers and Sailors will be held at St. Mary's Church, Primrose Hill, N.W.3 (Chalk Farm Tube), on Sunday evening, January 4. Evensong is at 6.30. There will be no sermon, and the carols will begin at 7.0. On this occasion St. Mary's choir and the English Folk and Carol Choir will join forces under the direction of Mr. Martin Shaw.

A special service in aid of the Serbian Red Cross will be held at Southwark Cathedral on January 17, at 3.0, when the Grail music from 'Parsifal,' unaccompanied motets and carols will be sung. No ticket for admission is required.

New Music

BY WILLIAM CHILD

PIANOFORTE MUSIC

A very courageous venture is the 'Repertoire Series of Pianoforte Music by Modern British Composers' (Ascherberg, Hopwood & Crew). I begin by laying stress on the publishers' courage, because it is a notorious fact that the native pianoforte composer who wrote with the well-equipped player in view has so far received very little recognition. In the matter of new music, one would almost suppose that pianists consisted of two classes only—the lions of the concert hall and the domestic performers of modest technique and uncertain taste. The earnest and well-equipped amateur has been credited with a desire for no company but the classics, with occasional sorties among the Russian and French schools. If our recitalists have excused their lack of enterprise by pointing to the meagre and scattered output of the native writer, they can do so no longer. Twelve numbers of the Repertoire Series have already been published, and a further batch is in the press. So much music of all kinds is waiting for review that there is no space for the detailed consideration most of it deserves. Of these new pianoforte works there is a great deal that could be said, and nearly all of it of a commendatory nature, but the briefest of comments must suffice.

The works are under the joint editorship of G. H. Clutsam and T. F. Dunhill.

Sir Charles Stanford leads off with a Ballad in which the promise of the opening is hardly borne out by a somewhat conventional middle section. John Ireland's 'Merry Andrew' is a piece that not only arrests attention, but holds it more and more on further acquaintance. York Bowen's Three Serious Dances are much more straightforward in idiom and technique, being attractive essays that make a ready appeal. There is rather more atmosphere in Percival Garratt's Two Diversions, especially in the first. The biggest work of the series is undoubtedly Herbert Howell's Rhapsody. There is emotional driving power behind it, and its numerous difficulties give full value. The writing for the keyboard is notable, though here and there the composer's message seems to call for a more ample medium. A fine piece this, by a composer of whom much may be expected. Another of the outstanding numbers of the series is by one of our younger writers, Arnold Bax, whose Romance is a good example of the highly imaginative and subtle type we have come to expect from him. Thomas F. Dunhill's Three Romantic Preludes are comparatively plain sailing after the Howell and Bax pieces. The same may be said of G. H. Clutsam's contribution, a rather too highly-spiced Berceuse. Surely if chromaticism is ever out of place it is so in a Cradle-song! Joseph Speaight's 'Nymph Dance' is an admirable piece of freakish writing, and Percy Pitt's Improvisation, after beginning by calling to mind Raff's 'La Fileuse,' settles down into an extended and fluent arpeggio study, with a well-defined tune floating around. But in all the batch there is nothing more attractive than Norman O'Neill's 'Carillon,' a charming piece of work of no great difficulty. The publishers are to be congratulated on this commencement of their enterprise. Now that they and the composers have provided the fare, it is to be hoped our teachers and players will do their part.

I pass over a good deal of music written for teaching purposes, mentioning only two items that strike me as models in their way—No. 6 of Ernest Austin's Musical Verses ('The Water-Wheel'), and Book Three of his 'Playtime Pieces'—a dozen of them (J. H. Larway). Mr. Austin has a very happy touch in this important department of composition, and hosts of youngsters must look on him as a jolly kind of musical uncle.

Harold Wallis's set of six short pieces under the general title of 'A Dream Garden' (Elkin & Co.) would please me more if they were not so overloaded with directions to the player. The first piece consists of only forty bars, but the composer feels it necessary to give the player no less than ninety-seven expression marks! And in the little piece called 'Dreaming,' there are, besides a preliminary 'dreamily,' two further directions 'very dreamily.' Surely the title and the character of the music ought to be sufficient for any player who is not an absolute blockhead. If he is, a crowd of directions will not help him. Mr. Wallis has a pleasant fancy, and a MacDowellish method which falls short of his model where neatness and convenient keyboard writing are concerned.

One has to spend a little time over the cover of the next item. It is fairly easy to discover Lord Berners's name at the top—with the S turned the wrong way. The welter of crudely stencilled letters below beat me. I managed to make out 'Chinoiserie,' and then I pursued my studies after the manner of Joe Gargery ('Here's a J and a O equal to anything'). Finally I gave it up, and weakly referred to the title-page, where the necessary particulars were set out in normal style—'Lord Berners. 'Chinoiserie,' 'Valse Sentimentale,' 'Kazatchok,' for pianoforte duet. (J. & W. Chester, Ltd.). I read further, 'Couverture, Illustrations, et Ornement de Michel Larionov.' The illustrations must be seen to be believed. They are not likely to be understood, and the accompanying titles are also calculated to keep one in the dark. Thus, the casually disposed letters CHICHIRI, with a few floating blue and brown full-stops, do not go far towards 'Chinoiserie.' Before the second piece we read VALZE SENTIMENTALE. Apparently Mr. Larionov got tired hereabouts. You will notice the subtle humour in the disposition of the S and I. Admitting that 'Valse Sentimentale' is perhaps rather a heavy dose for a stenciller, I turned to No. 3, feeling sure that 'Kazatchok' would not be decapitated. But evidently Mr. Larionov had mislaid his Z and forgotten an A, for only 'Katchok' appeared, as casually dispersed as the rest. I am aware that this method is on a level with the modern composer's elimination of the unessential, but in that case why not eliminate this and similar pages? It was a relief to get on to the music. Not that this was plain sailing. A reading at the necessary slow pace was about as comfortable as a progress over broken bottles. But let me hasten to admit that as familiarity and pace increased all but the worst asperities got ironed out surprisingly. 'Chinoiserie' is an excellent piece of humour of the arid kind. 'Valse Sentimentale' is less convincing. There should be sentiment, either real or mock. I could find none of either kind. Perhaps I expected something rather obvious, like the delicious passage 'avec une grande émotion' in Debussy's 'Golliwog's

Cake-walk.' The 'Kazatchok'—a Russian dance—played at anything like the proper pace would be one of the most exciting of musical experiences. There is a natural tendency to suppose that this type of music can be written by anybody, and that it can be done by putting down progressions haphazard. I advise anybody who thinks so to study these pieces, especially the third. He will find that some of the most daringly discordant passages are quite logical, being merely the old idea of an ostinato carried to its extreme limits. And just as in ordinary music an insignificant motive often becomes charged with meaning when repeated, so here progressions that the ear would reject if played once, succeed in justifying themselves by insistence. Nor is this music at all aimless. On the contrary, it is full of point and energy, and on due acquaintance leaves one convinced that its writing needs technique, though not of the kind we imbibe from textbooks. There is room in music for little grotesques of this kind, and no harm is done so long as everybody—including the composer—realises that it is a by-path that leads nowhere. A little of such artful and heartless stuff goes a long way. It is capital fun for a few minutes at a time, but as musical diet it is negligible. One might as well dine off chaff, or fill one's belly with the east wind.

That mere haphazard slinging about of chords is not sufficient for the composition of ultra-modern music is proved by a glance at Richard Johnson's Arabesque and Cecil Dudley's poem, 'Funeral of a little child' (Renaissance Music, Art, and General Publishing Co.). Here the writing is crude in the extreme, and there is an almost total absence of coherence. I am prepared to hear that both composers are well-equipped. I can only say that they disguise their attainments very completely. Such a passage as the following, which occurs at the end of Mr. Dudley's piece, may be all right in some circumstances, but I fail to see its point in a poem dealing with a child's funeral:

Probably the 8va..... mark in the lower staff is a mistake, but however the passage is played it can never sound like anything but a five-finger exercise executed on a pianoforte badly in need of a visit from the tuner. There may be humour in this presentment of the little study with which you and I began our musical career, but humour is out of place in a funeral poem. Most of the series of chords in this piece are the merest rambling, and the term cantabile queerly applied to such clumps of notes as those at the end of page 3 and at the close.

Such writing as this calls to mind the witty remark of Beerbohm Tree, 'Futurism is the loin-cloth of the incompetent.'

It is a pleasure to turn from Mr. Dudley to Rossini, whose light-hearted music, familiar to so many through 'La Boutique Fantasque,' is now available in album form for pianoforte solo (J. & W. Chester, Ltd.). Capital stuff this, though it is best enjoyed in doses of a couple of sections at a time. The cover is a real pleasure to the eye; the frontispiece is an eye-sore. If it were drawn by a school-boy we should tell him he had lots to learn, but as it is by Derain, it must be taken as high art. Nevertheless, most of us will think of the loin-cloth mentioned above.

ORGAN MUSIC

It is good to find our best English hymn-tunes being used as a basis for organ music. Works of the kind are excellent for recitals given in church, but they are even more useful for voluntaries. There can be no better postlude than a fine organ piece written round a tune which has been sung during the preceding service. In his Three Chorale Preludes (Novello), Harold Darke has made capital additions to our steadily growing store of works of this kind. The tunes treated are Reinagle's 'St. Peter,' 'Darwell's 148th,' and a melody by Tallis, the last-named an austere beautiful theme that grows on one. 'St. Peter' is given the simplest treatment of the three. Dr. Darke is content to use the plan made familiar to us by Bach and others of the older German composers, and in our own day by Parry. The music is quiet, only moderately difficult, and of a character that fits it for use before as well as after a service. Darwell's rousing tune comes in for more extended and ambitious treatment, and is called a 'Chorale Fantasia.' It opens with three pages of alternating big chords, recitativo, manual passages, and pedal solos—a method to which the organ lends itself specially well, though perhaps some of us feel there is a lack of freshness about it to-day. This section is followed by an Andante Tranquillo in D-8, with some graceful and flowing writing over a long tonic pedal which eventually moves and delivers the third line of the tune. Some excellent canonic imitation is seen in the next section (più mosso), which gradually works up to the final largamente, an imposing page and a half. The movement is difficult, and can make its full effect only on an organ of ample resource. It should be a popular recital number.

The prelude on the Tallis theme is less popular in style, but by far the most original and beautiful of the set. The spirit of the time has been admirably caught, and the result is an atmosphere of other-worldliness that is all too rarely met with. The harmony is chiefly diatonic, with discords freely used, and the treatment generally is more modern in style than is the case with the companion preludes. The registration is perhaps unnecessarily restless in the opening two pages. An effective alternative would be the restriction of the Great organ to the delivery of the melody in the tenor, everything else being played on the Swell, both hands coming on to the Great at line 4 of page 14. This beautiful prelude, though suitable for recital purposes, may most fittingly be used for a Voluntary on any solemn occasion. It makes a perfect piece for memorial services.

Part 8 of Ernest Austin's tone-poem, 'The Pilgrim's Progress,' is now published (J. H. Larway). Like its predecessors, it is an elaborate piece of programme music, highly picturesque, and well-written for the instrument, though the idiom is not that of conventional organ music. This part deals luridly with the Pilgrim's adventures in Vanity Fair.

Frank Bridge's contributions to the repertory of the organ are on the small side, but they are invariably original and effective. His set of Three Pieces (Winthrop Rogers) should be popular. They consist of an Allegretto grazioso, suggestive of a violin solo, an Allegro Commodo (a very quaint and ingenious little Ostinato), and a rousing Allegro Marziale. They are only moderately difficult. Apparently Mr. Bridge has been overhauling his manuscripts, for these pieces are dated 1905. The comparative simplicity of style will not be unwelcome to most players. Mr. Bridge shows here, as before, a feeling for the organ unexpected in one whose chief successes have been gained as a writer for strings.

CHORAL MUSIC

National songs, arranged for S.A.T.B., are among the most popular items at choral concerts. A good addition to the list is E. T. Sweeting's setting of 'The Deil's awa' wi' the Exciseman.' The composer has wisely done nothing to interrupt the irresistible 'go' of the well-known air, and the result is a part-song full of humour and point. The harmony is simple and the parts easy, but the setting provides a good test for pace and freedom.

Much the same qualities are called for in Reginald Somerville's 'Who rides for the King,' a part-song for T.T.B.B., the words by Harold Boulton. The headlong galloping energy is very effective.

Female voices of good technique will welcome 'The Rheingold,' an arrangement by W. McNaught of music from 'Das Rheingold' and 'Götterdämmerung,' the English words by W. Rothery. The work is for s.s.c., and would serve well as a test-piece for advanced choirs.

Much slighter in texture, but calling for neat and spirited performance, is Harold Rhodes's 'The Voice of Spring,' a two-part setting of a poem by Mrs. Hemans. As Mr. Rhodes writes for trebles only, the numerous female-voice choirs deficient in altos will find the song particularly useful. The music is very melodious and attractive, and the well-written and characteristic pianoforte part adds much to the effect. These four part-songs are published by Novello.

Letters to the Editor

THE Y.M.C.A. MUSIC SECTION

SIR,—At the moment when the Music Section of the Y.M.C.A. is not only undergoing reconstruction, but entering upon an entirely new phase of its activities, we crave leave to make use of your paper as medium for a short account of its work in the past. We venture to do this in view of your constant sympathy with its aims and the publicity you have always been ready to give to its appeals, and for which we desire to express our most grateful thanks.

Much has been accomplished since the Editors of the musical Press, called together by Mr. Percy Scholes, inaugurated the Y.M.C.A. Musicians' Gift to provide additional musical facilities for the members of H.M. Forces in Y.M.C.A. Huts and centres at home and abroad. Over 202,000 pieces of music and books on music and over 2,500 instruments have been despatched to Y.M.C.A. centres in every theatre of war; complete music libraries have been equipped at Rouen, Havre, Boulogne, Salonica, &c.; gifts of music and instruments have been freely distributed to the camps at home and in France, North and South Russia, Salonica, Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia, India, Constantinople, &c., and the Internment camps in Germany and at The Hague.

Despite the coming of peace much is still being done abroad, notably in Germany, where Y.M.C.A. Headquarters at Cologne and many other centres of the Rhine Army have been musically equipped. All this has been made possible through the generosity of the public, who responded so whole-heartedly to the appeal for gifts of money, music, and instruments, and to whom the Music Section acknowledges its deep debt of gratitude. The subjoined balance-sheet shows to what use the money collected for the Musicians' Gift has been put, and it will be seen that there is still a small sum in hand to initiate future activities.

Mr. Percy Scholes has retired from the position of Secretary of the Music Section, though still connected with it in an advisory capacity. Major J. T. Bavin has been appointed his successor, and has undertaken to carry on the splendid work. Major Bavin comes to the task with close on thirty years' experience of educational musical work at Berkhamsted School, and four years' military service, in the course of which he occupied the responsible posts of Adjutant, second in Command, and Education Officer in his Brigade and Division, and was mentioned for good work in 1917.

Major Bavin is as full of keenness and enthusiasm as was Mr. Scholes when he inaugurated the Music Section, and realises that although so much has been done, much more still remains to accomplish. In its reconstruction for peace-time work the Y.M.C.A. Music Section sets out to provide for the training of disabled ex-service men who are musically gifted, for the advancement of musical education by means of lectures, recitals, and concerts, and the establishment of music-study circles, male-voice choirs, chamber music societies, orchestras, brass bands, &c. Its aim is in fact the furtherance, through the Y.M.C.A., of anything that will help to supplement and enhance existing local effort and bring music into the national life. With this end in view it once more confidently appeals to all musicians and music-lovers for support—firstly, by asking them to raise funds by means of concerts and organ recitals; secondly, by further gifts of music, and books on musical subjects and instruments; thirdly, by local aid in helping choirs, &c.

The Music Section has the advantage of the support of Dr. Percy C. Buck, Prof. H. Walford Davies, Mr. A. A. Fitzsimmons, Mr. Harvey Grace, Mr. J. T. Lightwood, Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, Mr. Percy A. Scholes, Mrs. Z. F. Willis, Miss P. M. Walters, and the Rev. Basil Yeaxlee, on its committee.

Gifts of money, music books, and instruments, and offers of service should be sent to Major J. T. Bavin, at the Y.M.C.A. Music Section, Shakespeare Hut, Gower Street, London, W.C. 1.—Yours, &c.,

PROMENADE CONCERT PROGRAMMES

SIR,—I am writing to suggest that the Musical Times should open its columns to a really exhaustive interchange of ideas on the subject of Promenade Concert Programmes, present and future, and I should like to have the privilege of opening this discussion by saying one or two things about the now famous Wagner nights. Perhaps someone will then have something to say about the best way to run a Russian night, and so on.

The really amusing thing about Wagner's music in this country is that after hundreds of Wagner concerts the general public knows much less about Wagner than it does of any other first-class composer. The really disgraceful thing is that the high-priests of music, well aware of the ignorance of the public, are constantly taking liberties with Wagner that they would not dare to take with any other composer. The reason for the really amusing thing is that the tit-bits of Wagner that are constantly being dished-up represent about three per cent. of his output, whilst Beethoven can at least claim to have from thirty to forty per cent. of his compositions performed on his nights. It is idle to argue that whereas Beethoven was a concert-composer, Wagner was not. If that is the case, let's scrap the Wagner concerts, such as they are at present, altogether, for they are useless and often lead otherwise virtuous people to transgress. Witness the following: a friend of mine was giving a performance on the pianoforte of the second Act of 'Tristan.' At the close of the love duet, where the music which subsequently figures in the 'Liebestod' is first heard, one of the audience said in awed tones to two children: 'Now she's slowly dying!'

Here is an example of the really disgraceful thing: Turn up the analytical notes of an excerpt known as 'Wotan's Spear and the Sleeping Brynhilda,' where you will find things like this: 'The music now skips the Wanderer's invocation and Erda's reply,' &c., &c. Further on, 'We are soon at the change of tempo . . . where the heroine greets heaven and earth, but at her first words . . . there is a cut,' &c., &c. Imagine anyone treating a Brahms Symphony in this way. If the public really knew the third Act of 'Siegfried' it would not tolerate this brutal burlesque of one of Wagner's finest inspirations. If the public knew the second Act of 'Siegfried' it would not tolerate that brainless pot-pourri, 'Siegfried and the Forest Dragon,' in which the whole Act is bovrilized to about twenty minutes. If the public knew the second Act of 'Parsifal' it would howl with derision at the orchestral ending which someone has thought fit to tack on to Kundry's Narration. Now the obvious solution of all this is to give the public a chance of getting to know the essential music of Wagner by offering concert-performances of whole Acts at a time. There should be no difficulty about getting singers, as our rising operatic artists would be pleased to take part in performances—at a modest fee—that would be of the greatest value to them. Far more difficult would be the question of housing the singers, for if there is a sine qua non of a Wagner concert-performance it is that the singers must be out of sight. The orchestra does not matter, as it represents more or less the medium between the drama and the audience. But we cannot have the varied fauna of Northern Mythology (do I unconsciously borrow from my friend, Mr. Newman?) striking 'Thus spake Elijah' attitudes on the platform. They must love, hate, and fight in the organ loft.

Even if the question of getting singers did not prove feasible, a lot could be done to familiarise the public with Wagner's music by giving performances of the orchestral tissue only. 'Rheingold,' 'Walküre,' the first two Acts of 'Siegfried,' and parts of 'Parsifal' might sound a bit thin in this way. Not so the rest of the 'Ring' or 'Tristan' or 'Meistersinger.' I have heard innumerable performances of Acts on the pianoforte from the latter, and can vouch for the charm of this kind of thing. People would come from all over the country, and the Promenade at Queen's Hall would present the unusual sight of a vast crowd bent over vocal scores, devouring the music with its ears and the story with its eyes. It would not be the same crowd that has filled Queen's Hall on Monday nights for the last twenty-five years; but it would be as big—and much more intelligent. Above all, this sort of performance would breed an insatiable demand for frequent operatic performances of Wagner's later works, in which we are so disgracefully lacking at present. This alone would justify the venture. But would it be a venture? I know any number of people who consistently refuse to go and hear what they call Wagner pot-pourris, but who would go miles to hear the orchestral music accompanying, say, one Act of 'Götterdämmerung.' One thing remains to be said in this connection. The Queen's Hall Orchestra—as at present constituted—is too small to do justice to the music of Wagner's later operas. A recent performance of 'Waldweben' by the London Symphony Orchestra proved this conclusively—if, indeed, any proof was needed. This must certainly be remedied.

A word in conclusion: these suggestions will encounter most opposition from those who will urge lack of financial means and insufficient time for rehearsals. The former is hardly a serious objection, and as for the latter, let the performances themselves be in the nature of rehearsals without a boiled shirt in the landscape. Let Sir Henry Wood make his orchestra repeat over and over again in public difficult and badly-played passages. A really musical audience will be enchanted, and will benefit enormously by an occasional rough edge of this kind.

Mr. Editor, do not stop this discussion just when it is getting heated and instructive; or when some giant of withering invective kneels on the prostrate form of his 'young friend' and deftly deals the Johnson knock-out.—Yours, &c.,

ROBERT E. LORENZ.

'CONCERNING CUTS'

SIR,—Will you allow me to protest most strongly against Mr. Kalisch's statement in his article last month on music cuts, in which he says: 'The time will soon arrive when concert-givers of all types will say with reason that people will not come to hear the unabbreviated classics, and that they must be shortened or put on the shelf'?

Can anyone imagine what a great Symphony would sound like with 'cuts' made in it or a movement left out? It would be nothing short of desecration if this were done. There is I know a good deal of tiresome stuff in Schubert's Symphony in C, but surely no conductor would ever dream of leaving any of it out. Neither, by the way, have I ever heard a performance of that work which has emptied a concert hall.

Our musical public are sufficiently educated to know that a 'classic' Symphony contains more than one or two movements: indeed in the great Symphonies of Beethoven and Schumann the four movements form an organic whole, and as such cannot be separated without losing the whole effect. Elgar's 'Dorabella' Variation is hardly a case in point; besides, Mr. Kalisch says that the composer presumably sanctions a performance of it separately. But can he imagine any of the great masters sanctioning 'mutilated' performances of their Symphonies?—Yours, &c.,

LIONEL OVENDEN

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of January, 1860:

AS ORGANIST.—A first-rate Performer and Composer will undertake Cathedral or Parish Church service. Salary no object. The highest references as to talent and character. Address, Organo, Mr. Novello's, 35, Poultry.

WANTED for Christ Church, Banbury, an ORGANIST, for whom it is believed there is an opening for private teaching. Salary, £15. Apply to the Churchwardens of Christ Church.

BARROW.—A concert of vocal music, performed by the Amateur Choral Society of this place, came off on the 22nd instant; conductor, Mr. Gallop. The music was both sacred and secular, and was got up with much care.

BIRMINGHAM.—On Tuesday evening, December the 6th, an entertainment took place in the Town Hall, Birmingham, consisting of a Concertina contest, which was open to amateur performers (residents of the town only) under the age of 18, for four prizes. Nine youths competed. Mr. J. R. Lee, Mr. W. Masfield, jun., organist, and Mr. H. D. Johnson, were appointed to act as adjudicators of the prizes. The model brass band was in attendance, under the direction of Mr. G. S. Dowling, and performed several pieces on the occasion.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The Christmas entertainments, commencing on the great holiday, Boxing-day, will be varied and extensive. . . . The ample space at the Crystal Palace affords room for an extensive display of articles suitable to the approaching season. At dusk, it will be brilliantly lighted with varied gas devices, a delightful evening promenade, secured from wet and cold. A huge Christmas Tree will be placed in the centre of the building, which will be decorated with holly and evergreens, and a profusion of flags. The new hall for lectures and concerts is nearly finished, and will be opened by Mr. Pepper with a series of dissolving views and photographic illustrations.

OLDHAM.—The new organ just erected in Christ Church, by Messrs. Conacher & Co., of Huddersfield, was opened on Sunday, the 11th ult., by Mr. J. Lees, organist of the Parish Church. Mr. W. Parratt, of Huddersfield, performed on the same instrument the following evening.

VOCAL ASSOCIATION.—The prospectus of the fifth season of this association has just been issued by the secretary, Mr. Lockyer. . . . G. A. Macfarren's cantata May-day, and Charles Horsley's new oratorio, Gideon, are in active rehearsal, together with a variety of new and interesting part-songs, and will be performed during the approaching series of public concerts. The indefatigable and intelligent musician, Mr. Benedict, is still the conductor, and Lord Ward has kindly consented to become the president.

LUTHERAN CHURCH, LIBAU, RUSSIA

In view of the present crisis in the Baltic Provinces, the accompanying photograph will be of interest. In its day this organ was the largest in the world, and even now must be reckoned among the giants. It is unique in more than one respect. There are no composition pedals and no swell-box—in fact, there is nothing at all confronting one except stops and manuals (four). The stops are arranged in the old-fashioned manner—on both sides of the 'side-piece'—and are of great size, so much so that the player has almost to stand up to pull out those high up. The action is 'tracker,' the only modern addition being the electric wind installation. But the primitive blowing arrangements are still intact, and can be used if necessary. This mechanism demands the efforts of four men, who stand together and work with their feet, supporting themselves by their hands—very much after the style of the old treadmill. The tone is very fine, and the case quite magnificent, being entirely white enamel with large gilt figures. The whole church is very ornate, being white and gilt throughout. Libau was evacuated by the Germans in June last, seven months after the signing of the Armistice.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

The latter part of the Christmas term, which came to an end on December 13, included several public performances of more than ordinary interest and importance. On November 27, 28, and 29, three excellent representations of Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' were given by the lady students under the direction of Mr. Acton Bond, the rôles being interchanged for the first two performances, and the most successful performers selected for the third. While the students reached a high level of acting, Miss Phyllis Bradley's Olivia and Miss Isobel McLaren's Viola are worthy of a special word of praise. The play was produced on Elizabethan lines (with one break only) and traditional music, the instrumental parts of which were supplied by a quartet led by Miss Gladys Chester.

On Tuesday afternoon, December 9, an orchestral concert was given at Queen's Hall. The chief items were an Overture, 'As you like it,' by Richard Newton (scholar), a cleverly scored work of considerable promise; two movements of a Pianoforte Concerto by Ethel Bilsland (ex-student), the solo portions of which were admirably played by Miss Lillian Southgate; Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra by York Bowen (solo pianoforte, Miss Olga Carmine), and the Adagio and Allegro Giocoso from Brahms's Violin Concerto, beautifully played by Miss Dorothy Chalmers. The programme also included songs by A. C. Mackenzie and Coleridge-Taylor. Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted.

On November 26, Sir Alexander Mackenzie gave his fourth and last lecture on the 'Evolution of Music up to the time of Bach.' He referred to the work of Alessandro Scarlatti, and the rise of instrumental music of Domenico Scarlatti, Corelli, and their contemporaries, and described the rise of German music and the state of music generally in other European countries; also the influence of Handel upon music in England. Finally he exhorted students not to forget that it was their bounden duty to help forward the music of their own country by every means in their power, and he further pointed out to them that as teachers they would have many opportunities to help in the great work of re-instating English music in the proud position which it once occupied.

A most interesting gathering of past and present pupils of the R.A.M. took place at the Duke's Hall on Saturday, December 6, when the R.A.M. Club welcomed as guests any of these who had served in H.M. Forces. Sir Alexander Mackenzie, on behalf of the Club, spoke of the great pleasure which it gave both him personally and the Club to have as guests so many who had served their country in her recent need. In remembrance of those connected with the R.A.M. who had fallen in the war the Postlude for strings and organ, by Sir Alexander Mackenzie (which was first performed at the Memorial Service at the Temple Church) was played by a string orchestra, with Dr. Richards at the organ, while to emphasize musically the welcome to those present, 'See the Conquering hero comes' was played afterwards.

The arrangements for the Lent term include a course of lectures on 'Bach' by Dr. H. W. Richards, the first lecture to be given on January 28. Other lectures which form part of the Teachers' Training Course are 'Aural Training and Sight-Singing,' Mr. Ernest Read; 'Voice Culture and Class Singing,' Mr. Field Hyde; and on matters connected with the teaching of the Pianoforte, by Mr. Oscar Beringer and Mr. Frederick Moore.

The following appointments have recently been made to the staff of professors: Mr. Fraser Gange, Mr. Vivien Langrish, and Mr. Laurence Taylor.

The following awards have recently been made:

The Philip L. Agnew Prize (pianoforte) to Reginald Paul (a native of London), Reginald D. Morgan being highly commended and Rae Robertson commended. The adjudicators were Messrs. Philip L. Agnew and William Murdoch (chairman). The Potter Exhibition (pianoforte) to Reginald D. Morgan (a native of London). The adjudicators were Messrs. Ambrose Coviello, Victor Booth, and Harold Craxton (chairman). The Westmorland Scholarship (singing) to Betty Thompson (a native of New Southgate). The adjudicators were Miss Evelyn Langston, Mr. Frederick Keel, and Miss S. Pitt Soper (in the chair). The Battison Haynes Prize (composition) to Warwick Braithwaite (a native of Dunedin, New Zealand). The adjudicator was Sir A. C. Mackenzie.

SUMMARY TREATMENT OF A CRITIC

BY CLAUDE TREVOR

A most disgraceful scene took place at Bologna a short while ago. The incident was the outcome of one of a series of orchestral concerts, which included Beethoven's ninth Symphony. The reading of this number did not meet with the approval of the musical critic of the Resto del Carlino (the leading Bolognese newspaper), the result being that a day or two later the office of the paper was assailed by about two hundred members of the orchestral society concerned, who gathered in front of the building, calling loudly on the musical critic, Signor Bastianelli, to appear, and protesting in the wildest, most excited manner against his criticism of their execution of Beethoven's music. No response being given to their demand they entered the hall, ascended the stairs, and attempted to penetrate into the offices of the journal. While this was going on, Signor Bastianelli, entirely ignoring the disturbance, made his appearance on the Piazza before the building. Being recognised by those who had failed to push their way in, he was at once in the most shocking manner set upon and maltreated in disgraceful fashion, those who had still a spark of manly feeling being impotent to restrain his cowardly assailants in their dastardly attack. Speaking of the facts the Resto del Carlino writes:

'The importance of such an episode as that under discussion is not to be exaggerated, and finds its own condemnation. We must, however, most vigorously protest against the uncivilised proceedings, unworthy of Bologna, and the more reprehensible coming from a Society that was ever supported and defended by our paper beyond, perhaps, the limits demanded. In order that the public may judge freely the gravity of the oppression, and the attempt against free criticism—hence freedom—of the Press, we reproduce the criticism (which called forth the action complained of) by Signor Bastianelli, who is noted and esteemed throughout Italy and abroad as one of the first critics of our country.'

Below is Signor Bastianelli's notice of the concert, which was directed by Signor Guarnieri:

'... First of all, my sincere congratulations to the Bolognese public which assembled last evening in large numbers—worthy, indeed, of a great occasion. That was good; for whatever uncertainty there may prove to be in a concert, it is gratifying to note the love of music and appreciation of the delightful experiences provided by Antonio Guarnieri, thus encouraging the public of one of the most musical cities of Italy to flock in crowds to our principal theatre of music. And indeed the aspect of the Teatro Comunale last evening presented a coup d'aile which was the best proof of the disposition of those present for the hearing of great music, the attention of the gathering being truly edifying. Secondly, whatever I may say later does not in the least detract from what I have several times repeated concerning Maestro Guarnieri. We all make mistakes, and have our shortcomings. However, I do not forget that I am speaking of Antonio Guarnieri, who, indeed, in the present season of concerts has given us certain interpretations, sufficient witnesses of a great (I do not hesitate to use so mighty a word) interpreter, especially in his reading of Brahms's second Symphony and the "Siegfried" Funeral March. This is not said by way of blandishment for what follows. If I write thus of Guarnieri it is because in spite of the errors and horrors of last evening he deserves the respect due to the head of an army even when conquered. Therefore judge him with all military honours. And let justice be summary! He does not understand the "Ninth." To condone the hurried time and poverty of the first tempo, the exaggerated, aimless vulgarity of the Scherzo, the want of holding together his forces in the exquisite Adagio, the melodramatic rendering of the final movement, worthy of early Verdi or Ponchielli: the explanation for all these serious shortcomings has been put forward as want of preparation. This is not the case; the maestro does not understand Beethoven's ninth Symphony. Let him study; or, rather, let him wait till his conception of the music be more secure and mature. I in no manner affirm that the fiasco of last evening was discreditable to Guarnieri, or that such is definite or irreparable. I am sure he must feel that the ninth Symphony is not approached by him or interpreted with the perfect rendering of Brahms's No. 2, the "Siegfried" March, and many other pieces heard under his direction. I am a firm believer in miracles in art and artists, and I feel it my duty to say that till he feels in a position to do this, he be counselled not to touch Beethoven's great work. This advice is given by one who respects and admires him.

'GIANNOTTO BASTIANELLI.'

The Resto del Carlino adds:

'Whoever possesses the most elementary notion of what just criticism is worth cannot fail to appreciate the frankness of the critic's writing. Whoever does not consider a critic as merely an inflated, biased individual, must admire one who can sink personal sympathy and friendship before his own opinion, and consider only his duty to his art and the public. It is superfluous to express our complete solidarity with our friend Giannotto Bastianelli, to whom we anew affirm our sincerest affection and esteem. Since, however, the deplorable and disgraceful fact we are discussing demonstrates a tendency to injure a high professional principle, we have without delay taken measures to enlist the support of journalists throughout all Italy to decide on what steps shall be taken.'

A day or two later a meeting was held by members of the Association of the Press in the province of Emilia to discuss the dastardly behaviour referred to. The meeting was crowded and representative. Loud and long applause greeted a letter from the musical critic of another prominent Bolognese paper, L'Avvenire d'Italia. Then ensued a calm discussion of the subject of the meeting, which was unanimous in deploring an act recognised as an attempt to strike at the fundamental right of the critic—viz., free speech. An unanimous vote was passed as follows:

On account of the shameful aggression perpetrated by a large number of members of the *Associazione dei Lavoratori dei Teatri against the musical critic Giannotto Bastianelli, we, of the Association of the Emilian Press, hereby protest against the outrage on the rights of journalistic criticism, that demands perfect freedom for its efficient exercise.

From this moment we, the journalists of Bologna, and the correspondents to all other parts of Italy, agree to abstain absolutely from taking any interest whatsoever in the theatrical performances of the city, until certain of the Associazione dei Lavoratori dei Teatri give ample explanation that they had no hand with those guilty of the aggression we so strongly condemn. Finally we decide to communicate this our decision to the Association of the Roman Press. It will be interesting to see what turn events will take.

* Association of those employed in theatres.

Music in the Provinces

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS)

BELFAST

One of the most successful concerts ever given by the Philharmonic Society took place on November 26. Its great feature was the first performance at Belfast of Mr. Hamilton Harty's fine work 'The Mystic Trumpeter,' conducted by the composer. The noble poem by Walt Whitman is illuminated with masterly skill by Mr. Harty's genius, and the result is a wonderfully satisfying whole. The work, both for chorus and orchestra, is full of difficulties which could not have been overcome but for the careful and laborious preparation made by the Society's conductor, Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, and it was most gratifying to the Society to receive from Mr. Harty enthusiastic praise for a performance of his work which, he said, was the best he had ever conducted. The solo part was admirably sung by Mr. Herbert Heyner. The rest of the programme consisted of violin solos by that excellent violinist, Mr. Arthur Catterall, and a choice selection of songs sung by Mr. Heyner—three of these being by Mr. Harty, who accompanied them. The orchestra played Borodin's Symphony in B minor, Wagner's 'Meistersinger' Overture, and Mr. Harty's 'Comedy Overture,' Op. 15, which he conducted. The whole concert was thoroughly enjoyed by a crowded audience.

The Belfast Symphony Orchestra, of which Mr. E. Godfrey Brown is the conductor, gave a very successful concert on November 29. The soloists were Miss Eva G. Lynas (vocalist), and Mr. George A. Vincent (violinist). Mr. Vincent contributed two movements of Mendelssohn's Concerto, and other pieces. The orchestra played Beethoven's Symphony in C minor (Op. 67), Wagner's 'Meistersinger' Overture, 'Slavonic Dance' No. 8, in C minor, by Dvorák, and a movement (No. 2) from Schubert's Ballet Music, 'Rosamunde.' There was also a finely-performed solo on the bassoon by Mr. Maurice Whittaker. These concerts supply a great want and are much appreciated.

BIRMINGHAM

Another busy month of musical doings at Birmingham has to be recorded; indeed almost daily one notices in the columns of our daily press that fresh concerts are cropping up on all sides. It is almost impossible to cope with them in detail, only a general resumé being possible. A notable innovation is, however, the increase of chamber concerts. The Catterall Quartet is of course firmly established here, and now Mr. Richard Wassell has started a series of chamber concerts, the first of which was given at the Royal Society of Artists' Gallery on November 19.

Although very good of its kind, the programme would perhaps have been more suitable for a miscellaneous than a purely chamber concert. The artists were of more than ordinary ability. Miss Sybil Eaton, an artist of fine technique, temperament, and scholarly attainments, was the violinist, Miss Winifred Taylor the pianist, and Mr. Richard Wassell director and accompanist. The vocalist was Mr. John Goss.

The first of four chamber concerts was given at the Royal Society of Artists' Gallery on November 20, the artists being Mr. Percival Hodgson (1st violin), Mr. Charles W. Bye (2nd violin), Mr. Paul Beard (viola), Miss Joan Willis (violin), Miss Mignon Nevada, Miss Astra Desmond, and Miss Margaret Cooper.

A pianoforte recital was given at the Midland Institute on November 15, by Mr. Leonard Rayner, who, one is glad to say, has now recovered from his recent serious nervous breakdown.

'Elijah' received a popular performance by the Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association at the Town Hall on November 15, under Mr. Joseph H. Adams's painstaking conductorship. The chorus was well balanced, and good results were attained in ensemble and precision. There was however no special feature of distinction, and from year to year one has become accustomed to such performances of 'Elijah' and 'Messiah.' The principals—Miss Lilian Green, Miss Amy Carter, Mr. Albert E. Benson, and Mr. Charles Till—formed an excellent and reliable quartet of solo artists. Mr. C. W. Perkins gave splendid support at the organ.

The second International Celebrity Concert took place at the Town Hall on November 20, but the attendance was by no means so great as at the first, when Dame Melba appeared. In place of Kubelik, who was not able to come to England, the great violinist Bronislaw Huberman made his first appearance at Birmingham, and was joined by Miss Katherine Goodson in a masterly performance of Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' Sonata for pianoforte and violin. The new tenor, Mr. Tom Burke, made his second appearance this season, and again won a great success. Mr. Watkin Mills was also well received.

In aid of the National Institute for the Blind a concert was given at the Town Hall on November 22 under Mr. Sidney Stoddard's organization. He had the valuable assistance of the newly-formed Police Band, now augmented to nearly fifty performers, under Mr. Appleby Matthews's conductorship. The Band is making remarkable progress since Mr. Matthews was officially appointed bandmaster, and much will be expected from it in the future. The programme, of a strictly popular character, included the Overture to 'Tannhäuser' and Tchaikovsky's '1812.' The tonality of the players is well maintained, both reeds and brass making a splendid display. The vocalists were Miss Megan Foster and Mr. Harold Casey, and the accompanist Mr. Michael Mullinar. The whole concert proved a popular success.

A new Orchestral Fantasia by Mr. Orsmund Anderton, entitled 'Virgil,' was given for the first time at the Futurist on November 23, the occasion being one of Mr. Appleby Matthews's Sunday Orchestral Concerts. It is based on Tennyson's 'Apostrophe,' quotations of which were given to assist understanding. The composer has found the right atmosphere, and created a decidedly clever work which one would be glad to hear again.

A service promoted by the Birmingham Diocesan Plain-Song Association was held in the Cathedral on Saturday afternoon, November 22. The Rev. A. W. Hatherley, musical director to the Association, was in charge of the singing, and Mr. E. H. Baxter, organist of St. Alban's, Small Heath, was organist for the service. Owing to serious illness, Mr. G. H. Manton was unable to give the recital of 'Old English organ music' as announced.

Mr. Edmund Edwards's second concert, given at the Majestic Theatre, Bearwood, on Sunday evening, November 23, was principally noteworthy on account of the singing of Miss Agnes Nicholls. Bearwood is a suburb of Birmingham.

The second Quinlan Subscription Concert brought a strong quintet of artists to the Town Hall on November 25—Madame Suggia (violin), Mr. Albert Sammons (violin), Miss Mignon Nevada, Miss Astra Desmond, and Miss Margaret Cooper.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society scored a triumph on November 26 with a magnificent and deeply-moving performance of Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius,' given at the Town Hall before a large audience. Sir Henry Wood was on his mettle, and conducted one of the best performances of this work heard at Birmingham since its first production here at our Festival in 1900. There may have been differences of opinion as to the balance of tone-power, but of dramatic choral effect and the fine playing of the orchestra there could be no manner of doubt. Mr. C. W. Perkins once more occupied his old post at the organ. Miss Muriel Foster's place was taken by Madame Kirkby Lunn, who with Mr. John Coates and Mr. Herbert Brown upheld the standard of the performance. The orchestra and chorus numbered three hundred and fifty performers.

A song recital was given by Miss Enid Finch, a young local soprano, at the Imperial Hotel on November 17. Her voice is of clear and pleasing timbre, and in her delivery she gives evidence of temperament and musical intuition. Mr. Howard Rutter, a talented violinist, supplied a number of admirably executed solos, and Mr. George Russell accompanied throughout the evening with perfect art.

Mr. Herbert S. Brown's popular concert given at the Midland Institute on November 29 made a strong appeal to Saturday night audiences. The concert-giver was fortunate in securing a brilliant array of artists, comprising our excellent soprano, Miss Margaret Harrison, Miss Joan Willis (violin), Mr. Howard Rutter (violin), and Mr. Arthur Cooke (solo pianoforte). Mr. Brown ably discharged the duties of accompanist.

Madame Minadieu's second Matinée Musicale, given at the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on November 29, was an artistic affair—indeed one of the most delightful and enjoyable musical functions connected with our busy musical season. The artists who contributed were Miss Adela Verne (pianoforte), Mr. Arthur Catterall (violin), and Miss Helen Anderton (vocalist).

The second chamber concert of the season provided by the Catterall Quartet took place on December 2 at the Royal Society of Artists' Gallery. This artistic combination of players again realised splendid tone-colour and every possible nuance of light and shade in their masterly reading of Beethoven's Quartet in A minor, Op. 132, Elgar's Quartet, Op. 83, in E minor (given for the second time by the same artists), and Frank Bridge's 'Three Idylls.'

The same evening a crowded assembly gathered in the Town Hall to hear Mr. Appleby Matthews's performance of 'Messiah' with his well-trained Choral Society. Both in tempi and in attack and general tone-colour Mr. Matthews's reading of the work was somewhat of a revelation, for he seemed to infuse new life into the great world-famed epic. Several important cuts were made, the Hallelujah chorus coming last of all. The finely-balanced chorus greatly distinguished itself. The solo artists were Miss Emily Broughton, Miss Hillier, Mr. W. Heseltine, and the Australian bass, Captain Stevens.

In aid of the Crippled Children's Fund a temperance concert was given at the Town Hall on December 1, which opened with an organ recital by Mr. C. W. Perkins. The following Choral Societies took part in the proceedings: Selly Oak Choral Union, White Ribbon Choir, Citadel Songster Brigade, and Victoria Road (Aston) Songsters.

Mr. Max Mossel's second popular concert of the current series of four was given at the Central Hall on December 3. The excellent programme was a happy blending of instrumental music. The only concerted piece was Grieg's Sonata in G major, Op. 13, for pianoforte and violin, played with consummate art by Miss Myra Hess and Mr. Max Mossel. The vocalists were Madame Elsa Stralia and Mr. John Coates, who were in excellent voice and created great enthusiasm.

The Midland Musical Society gave a popular Elgar concert at the Town Hall on December 6. Admirably prepared and conducted by Mr. A. J. Cotton, the full chorus and orchestra of the Society was present in force, and evidently were on their mettle to do justice to Elgar and their organization. The Elgarian selections comprised 'Spirit of England,' 'The Black Knight,' and 'Carillon,' the latter given without recitation of Cammaerts's poem, the new orchestral arrangement being used. Miss Agnes Nicholls was the vocalist.

A fund has been opened to found a Stockley musical scholarship at the Midland Institute School of Music in memory of the late Mr. William C. Stockley, who was for forty years conductor of the Festival Choral Society, and also conducted the Wolverhampton and Walsall Choral Societies, acted as chorus-master at the Triennial Festival, and was an honorary principal of the School of Music.

BOURNEMOUTH

Though Mr. Dan Godfréy did not introduce at the recent Symphony Concerts any formidable composition of current moment, such as Scriabin's 'Divine Poem' or Elgar's new Violoncello Concerto, still he gave us one or two works of noble proportions and absorbing interest, along with a residue that is always worthy of revival.

Foremost among the outstanding works were Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations and the Brahms Violin Concerto—possibly their freshness in comparison with others of quite equal value was due to the fact that they appear so much less frequently in our programmes than some admittedly important works which would really be the better for a short rest. Whatever the cause, however, the Elgar Variations undeniably constituted the bonne bouche of the fifth concert of the series, entirely overshadowing even such an attractive composition as Borodin's B minor Symphony. The success of this intrinsically English orchestral composition must have been very gratifying to Mr. Godfrey, who had plainly expended a large amount of time in rehearsing it. At any rate, it had never been heard to greater advantage at Bournemouth, as indeed its reception at the hands of the audience fully testified.

Those who are well acquainted with Brahms's Violin Concerto through the medium of repeated hearings must be conscious of the fact that it is only a small percentage of the many violinists essaying it who actually reveal the soul of this massive work. Among successful exponents, however, must be accounted Madame Adila Fachiri (Adila von Aranyi). Her performance on December 4, at the eighth Symphony Concert, was a virile expression of the content of the music—at once commanding, thoughtful, serene.

A delightful experience was the first performance here of a Suite, 'English Pastoral Impressions,' from the pen of that poetical young musician, the late Ernest Farrar, whose life was given on the Western Front. The sylvan charm, the idyllic placidity and open-air freshness of this music, came like a clean breath from the hills. So characteristic a work should not be permitted to sink into oblivion.

Other numbers of interest that have recently been performed include Mozart's 'Magic Flute' Overture, Schumann's B flat Symphony, Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony, Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' Overture, and the 'In der Natur' Overture by Dvůřák. The Schumann Symphony and the Mendelssohn Overture were particularly well played, conductor and orchestra deserving every credit for their capital presentations of these popular pieces.

Besides Madame Fachiri we have had as soloists Mr. Sidney Freedman, Mr. Gordon Bryan, and Miss Margaret Tilly. Mr. Freedman played a Romance for violin and orchestra by Philip Levine, a rather ordinary composition. The violin playing was clever, but the tone that the performer extracted from his instrument was not to our liking. The Balakirev Pianoforte Concerto is a peculiarly difficult work to interpret faithfully, owing to the very secondary position allotted to the pianist. Mr. Bryan, however, adopted an essentially correct attitude towards it, and with his dexterous and neat passage-work fulfilled his rôle in a thoroughly efficient manner. Miss Tilly's performance of the familiar G minor Pianoforte Concerto by Saint-Saëns was likewise unusually clean and polished in style, although somewhat lacking in vigour and animation.

BRISTOL

We have again had a full month's music at Bristol. An interesting gathering was the annual meeting of the Bristol Musical Club, when the president, Dr. Basil Harwood, in referring to the increasing number of performing members, said he thought the after-war tendencies with regard to music were encouraging. Choral Societies were resuming their activities, and at Birmingham a city orchestra was being formed. That was a movement other cities might well follow. Dr. Harwood in his speech took the opportunity to advocate an idea which was dealt with in my last letter, viz., the establishment of a permanent first-class orchestra for Bristol, an idea which has also found so warm a supporter in Mr. Napier Miles, our leading local amateur. A writer in a local paper recently outlined a scheme for a winter garden in which this artistic lack at Bristol would be supplied. The proposal took the form of a spacious building with lounge, tea-rooms, &c., and central concert-hall adaptable to three sizes for different classes of performance.

In this building a home would be found for a first-class permanent orchestra, playing every day, and with special arrangements for the production of symphonies. There is little doubt that if Bristol's rich men would take up such a scheme it would be a success, musically and financially, for at Bristol, apart from the houses of entertainment, there is no place but the streets in which young people can foregather.

At the second Quinlan Concert on Monday, November 24, Bristol had the opportunity of hearing Madame Suggia on the violoncello and Mr. Albert Sammons on the violin, the list of artists also including Miss Mignon Nevada and Miss Astra Desmond. Mr. Sammons was the best male violinist of front rank heard at Bristol for a long time. Then came Madame Clara Butt, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, and the Coldstream Guards Band (under Major Mackenzie Rogan), who gave three concerts, in two days.

Bristol Choral Society, with Miss Rosina Buckman, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, Mr. Charles Knowles, Mr. Robert Radford, and Miss Gertrude Winchester, a leading local singer, gave a very splendid performance of Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman,' under the direction of Mr. George Riseley, on Saturday, November 29. The choral parts were very vividly portrayed, the 'Spinning Wheel' haunting the ear for days afterwards. The male voices were perhaps not quite so lusty as they should have been, but Miss Rosina Buckman invested the part of Senta with a marked dramatic personality, and the music of the Dutchman and Daland was splendidly declaimed.

Bristol New Philharmonic Society gave an ambitious but rather severe programme for the first concert of the Society's nineteenth season, on Wednesday, December 3. There was a choir of about a hundred and fifty, while the band of some fifty performers included several players specially engaged from London. All were under the conductorship of Mr. Arnold Barter. The choir gave a very creditable performance of Bach's 'God goeth up with shouting' and Frank Bridge's 'Prayer.' The latter is certainly a scholarly but not remarkable work. Two quaint examples of realism in music—John Ireland's 'Forgotten Rite' and Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem 'Le Rouet d'Omphale'—were provided by the band. Miss Margaret Fairless played the Beethoven Violin Concerto with marked cleverness and technique, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow sang, amongst other numbers, three of Mr. Cecil Sharp's 'Folk-Songs from Somerset.' Mr. Barter is to be congratulated upon his endeavour to present good but little-known music as opposed to a popular programme.

On the same night the newly formed Bristol South Choral Society gave its first concert in the Y.M.C.A. Hall. Barnett's 'Ancient Mariner' was admirably interpreted by choir and principals and the useful little band, under the conductorship of Mr. R. T. Young, who had well drilled his forces. Some of the principals were pupils of Mr. George Riseley, who is vice-president of the Society and was present at the concert. He was greatly pleased, and expressed his intention of helping the Society by every means in his power. Mr. Riseley urged that a choral society should be formed in every suburb, district, and village around Bristol.

Under the auspices of the Ladies' and Bristol Musical Clubs the Catterall Quartet gave an excellent and artistic chamber concert at the Victoria Rooms, on Monday, December 1. The programme consisted of Quartets of Mozart in D minor, Elgar, and Debussy, that of Elgar receiving its first public performance at Bristol on this occasion.

We have had an interesting visit from Mr. Harvey Grace, who gave a recital on the St. Mary Redcliffe organ as one of the series arranged by Mr. R. T. Morgan, and lectured for the Church Music Society at Clifton on 'Music in the Parish Churches: Some needs of to-day,' on Tuesday, December 2. Mr. P. Napier Miles, who was to have presided, sent a letter in which he advocated the choice of simpler and more devotional Church music, and urged that greater attention be given to the works of British composers. Mr. Grace dealt with his subject under five heads, viz.: The necessity for a standard; Greater simplicity; More variety; A better standard of churchmanship amongst chorists; and A quickening of public interest.

Bristol Musical Society gave the 'Golden Legend' at its opening concert of the season in Victoria Rooms, but unfortunately the same work had been done only about a month before by the Choral Society on a larger scale. The choir numbered about two hundred and the band about forty-five. Mr. C. W. Stear conducted, the soloists being Miss Ida Cooper, Miss Gladys Palmer, Mr. Frank Webster, and Mr. John Buckley. The choir displayed considerable power and clean phrasing, the final chorus, 'God sent His messenger the rain,' being sung with much steadiness and tunefulness. In the second half of the programme, devoted to miscellaneous numbers, Miss Ruby Taylor, a local pianist of much merit, took the solo part in Grieg's Concerto in A minor. Mr. Stear is to be heartily congratulated on the standard of the Society's work.

The second concert of the Clifton Chamber Party, at Victoria Rooms, included Tchaikovsky's Quartet in F major, a Quartet by Frank Bridge, containing three movements on popular airs, César Franck's Pianoforte Quintet in F minor, and Bach's Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue, with Mr. Parsons at the pianoforte.

The Society of Bristol Glee-men gave their first concert of the season at Victoria Rooms on December 10. There were about a hundred and twenty voices, including sixty boys from Bristol Grammar School, the performance being conducted by Mr. C. W. Stear. In a programme calling for no special remark, various more or less popular part-songs were given with much spirit and taste. The Bristol Glee Quartet delighted the large audience, and Miss A. M. Couper, Mr. Victor Lovell, and Mr. Herbert Spiller contributed several solos to the long programme, which included Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' with accompaniment of pianoforte and organ.

Mr. Hubert Hunt, the Cathedral organist, gave an interesting lecture on 'Worship-music' at St. Thomas's Church room. In dealing with various aspects of the vocal portion of his subject, he referred to the value of acoustic in churches. He also claimed that many present-day compositions were 'showy' rather than devotional. Mr. Hunt pleaded for music written for the mind rather than the ear.

The second International Celebrity Concert at Colston Hall, on Monday, December 8, was remarkable for the enthusiasm that characterised the reception given to the new British tenor, Mr. Tom Burke. On the same occasion Miss Adela Verne played delightfully, Mr. Watkin Mills—who sang thirty-four years ago on the same platform—gave much pleasure by his reappearance, and M. Bronislaw Huberman, the Polish violinist, who took the place of Kubelik, played with fine appreciation the 'Kreutzer Sonata.'

Much interest was taken in the Jubilee of Mr. F. E. Weatherly, the well-known Bristol barrister and song-writer, who was honoured in London on December 11 by a dinner and presentation. Many of Mr. Weatherly's songs are domestic treasures at Bristol. Two other Bristol veterans, Mr. J. L. Roeckel and Mr. George Riseley, went to London especially to be present.

It is interesting to note that two famous singers, well-tried favourites at Bristol—Miss Ruth Vincent and Mr. Ben Davies—have been great attractions recently at the Bristol Hippodrome.

Another new Choral Society formed in Oldland and district, just outside Bristol, gave its first public concert on December 13. The performance of 'Messiah' would have done credit to a much larger and older body.

COVENTRY AND DISTRICT

Mid-November brought with it the first concert this season of the Coventry Philharmonic Society, which produced Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' at the Empire Theatre. Miss Minnie Searle and Mr. John Adams were the principal soloists, and Mr. C. Matthews conducted. The orchestra played well throughout, but the performance of the choir is open to criticism in the matter of forte attack, although the quiet passages, especially those that are unaccompanied, were well sung.

Melsa, the Polish violinist, was accorded a hearty reception on his appearance at the Opera House Sunday Concerts on November 16. Shapiro, the Russian pianist, Mr. Harold Williams, the Australian baritone, and others contributed to the same programme.

Elgar's new Sonata, Op. 82, was heard for the first time at Coventry on November 17, when it was performed by Mr. Norris Stanley (violin) and Miss Winifred Taylor (pianoforte) at a concert held in the Baths Assembly Hall.

The Centaur Orchestra, entirely composed of boy players, under the leadership of Mr. Alfred Petty, a local conductor of long experience, gave its first concert of the season in the Baths Hall on November 19. The programme included the 'Farewell' Symphony (Haydn), 'Marche Militaire' (Schubert), and popular operatic selections. In the same hall, on November 22, Coventry Choral Society, conducted by Mr. John Potter, sang among other items Marenzio's five-part madrigal 'Spring returns,' 'The Pampas Grass' (Sakhnovsky), 'The Singers' (Mackenzie), 'Corydon arise' (Stanford), and Coleridge-Taylor's part-song 'The Sea-shell.' Miss Joan Willis contributed violoncello solos.

Mr. Gervase Elwes made his first appearance at Coventry when he sang at the Opera House Sunday Concert on November 23. At the same concert Miss Lena Kontorovitch (violin) joined Mr. Michael Mullinar (pianoforte) in an interpretation of Grieg's Sonata in G minor for violin and pianoforte.

Mr. Murray Davey sang on the following Sunday, November 30.

The Coventry Chamber Music Society held its first concert of the season in St. Mary's Hall on December 4. The Arthur Hytch String Quartet played Haydn's Quartet in G major, Op. 51, No. 1, Quartet in D, Op. 11 (Tchaikovsky), 'Sally in our Alley' and 'Cherry Ripe' (Bridge), 'Widdicombe Fair' (Julius Harrison), and other items, Madame Elma Baker singing Schumann's 'Moonlight' and modern songs by Granville Bantock. The historical associations of the hall added to the interest of the music.

The Leamington Orchestral Society's first concert of its thirty-second season took place in the Town Hall, Leamington, on November 22. Mr. Walter Warren, organist of St. Peter's Catholic Church, conducted the orchestra, which played Symphony No. 8 (Beethoven), two Aubades (Lalo), and excerpts from grand opera. Miss Marion Snowden, a pianist of ability, joined the orchestra in a very fine interpretation of César Franck's 'Variations Symphoniques.' The vocalist was Miss Dorothy Robson.

Mr. Wilfrid Ridgway and Miss Francesca Hall collaborated in a pianoforte and song recital at Leamington Town Hall on November 25. Both artists are well known in the Midlands. Pianoforte works by Scriabin, Medtner, Glazounov, Liapounov, Bach, Liszt, and Chopin were presented, while the vocalist contributed songs by Grieg and Saint-Saëns, and ballads by Mr. Eric Overell, a Leamington composer.

The Warwick Musical Society gave a chamber concert in the Court House, Warwick, on December 9, when a well-varied programme was presented.

DARLINGTON AND DISTRICT

The second concert of the Darlington Chamber Music Society was given on November 27, the programme including Brahms's Pianoforte Trio in C major, Tartini's 'Devil's Trill' Sonata, Cyril Scott's 'My Captain,' and 'Invictus,' by Bruno Hahn. Miss Ethel Page (pianoforte), Miss D'Aranyi (violin), and Mr. Kenneth Henderson (vocalist), were the artists. On December 8, Miss Ethel Harrison and Miss Hetty Page gave a pianoforte and violin recital at Polam Hall, Darlington. Chamber music is gradually coming into its own in the district.

The Bishop Auckland Musical Society, which is under the inspiring influence of Dr. Kilburn, has always been to the fore with new works. It was one of the first in England to give such things as Liszt's 'St. Elisabeth,' and the early cantatas of Mackenzie, Waltham, Elgar, and all our leading British composers. For the concert on December 2, at the Town Hall, Sir Edward Elgar was present and conducted his 'Enigma' Variations, the 'Cockaigne' Overture, and the 'Wand of Youth' Suite. The choir gave fine performances of 'The Music Makers' (dedicated to Dr. Kilburn), and the 'Bavarian Highlands' Suite. Madame Jennie Hook contributed fine interpretations of two songs by Elgar—'The Torch' and 'The River,' with orchestral accompaniment. The band was the Leeds Symphony Orchestra.

The same programme was repeated at Middlesbrough the following night by the Musical Union, with the substitution of 'The Spirit of England' and the 'Banner of St. George' for 'The Music Makers.' Sir Edward was again present on this occasion to conduct the instrumental numbers. The choral works were conducted at both concerts by Dr. Kilburn with conspicuous energy and control. Middlesbrough has the reputation of being a musical town, but the audience was not too abundant for so important an occasion.

On December 9 the newly formed Co-operative Choral Society gave a selection from 'Messiah,' followed by a miscellaneous group of operatic numbers of the ultra-popular type. The choir is enthusiastic and vigorous, and bids fair to do excellent work. On November 19 the third Corbett concert took place, with Messdames Mignon Nevada, Astra Desmond, and Margaret Cooper, and Messrs. Robert Radford and Albert Sammons as soloists.

The first of a series of concerts by Mr. Lionel Powell was given on November 30, when Dame Melba, Mr. Tom Burke, and Miss Katherine Goodson were the attractions.

Apart from the larger towns there is much musical activity in South Durham, especially in the mining districts. As an example of musical enthusiasm and enterprise, the Primitive Methodist Church Choir at Spennymoor for its Choir Sunday on December 14 gave Spohr's 'Last Judgment' and Mendelssohn's 'As the hart pants,' conducted by the choirmaster, Mr. Mason.

DEVON AND CORNWALL

DEVON

Miss Marguerite Lane, pianist and composer, gave a recital of her own works at Exeter on November 25. Her more serious compositions, e.g., 'Carnaval' and a 'Children's Cycle of Songs' (sung by Miss Upward), show originality and grasp of the art of composition. It is, however, as a pianist that Miss Lane ranks highest. Her technique is fluent, and her expression enthusiastic. She was equally convincing in Bach, Schumann, and Brahms, in addition to her own pleasing music.

An interesting event at Exeter, on December 2, was a lecture-recital given by Mr. Cyril Scott and Madame Delines (vocalist). Mr. Scott indicated the lines along which modern music is progressing, freedom being his motto, as defined in unrestricted expression of thought and emotion. He pleaded for unity of all the arts, demonstrating their close relationship to each other. His pianoforte pieces, played with exquisite charm, delicacy, and gradation, exerted fascination over his hearers, their impressionistic character appealing with elevating influence to the senses and intelligence. Among the most beautiful were 'Bells,' 'Pastoral' No. 1, 'Ode Héroïque,' and a brilliant 'Rondeau de Concert.' Songs, interpreted with artistry and charm by Madame Delines, were 'Sorrow,' 'Lullaby,' 'The trysting tree,' and 'Night Song.'

The south of England offers few opportunities for hearing such delightful choral singing as is found at Barnstaple, where the Music Festival Society has had the advantage of thirty-three years' training by Dr. H. J. Edwards. On November 19 the Society gave a satisfying and truly artistic performance of Dr. Edwards's 'Hymn of Victory and Peace,' produced at Exeter three weeks earlier. The singing was intelligent, musicianly, pure, and beautiful in tone, as heard in the wonderfully impressive work, in Hubert Bath's 'Shon Maclean' (of which Mr. Allan Allen, who came to assist in conducting, secured a brilliant performance, little short of perfection), in the 'Hymn of Praise,' and in 'Blest Pair of Sirens.' An excellent orchestra, led with much skill by Mr. Percy Parish, was mainly local, reinforced from Bristol.

Dr. Weekes's Choir at Plymouth has been resuscitated, and though the singers appeared small in number and weak in the male section on December 3, their performance was refined and pleasing. Conducted by Mr. Walter Weekes, they sang 'My bonnie lass' (Edward German), 'There is a lady sweet and kind' (Darke), 'Summer is gone' (Coleridge-Taylor), 'Cargoes' (Balfour Gardiner), and 'Rolling down to Rio' (German). Mr. Cyril Scott played several of his own pianoforte pieces. Mr. Robert Radford, Madame Donald, and M. Mischa Léon, severally and collectively gave a fine vocal programme.

Conducted by Mr. Douglas Durstan, the choir of Sherwell Church, Plymouth, sang Gaul's 'Holy City' on December 10.

Plymouth Ladies' Choir, under the training of Mr. Percy E. Butchers, has progressed considerably since last season, as was shown at its concert on December 10. Elgar's 'My love dwelt in a Northern land' was very well sung, and the choir also gave good interpretations of several Scotch folk-songs and made other additions to its repertory. A prominent feature of the concert was the performance of Elgar's Sonata for violin and pianoforte by Messrs. Albert Sammons and William Murdoch. Both artists aroused great enthusiasm by their artistic playing of solos, and also of the 'Kreutzer Sonata.'

The new Y.M.C.A. Male Choir at Barnstaple is evidently destined to take definite place in the music of that musical town. Conducted by Mr. Alfred Long it has already added to its repertory music by Walford Davies, Sullivan, West, and Elliot Button. The Plymouth Orpheus Male-Voice Choir had to fight mischances (a fire and tempestuous weather among them) for its concert on November 30, but nevertheless achieved a triumph. Mr. David Parkes conducted an interesting programme of songs by Cooke, Jenkins, Fletcher, Abt, and Maunder. The singers' performance of Rogers's 'Where lies the Land' was conspicuously good. Exeter Male Choir (conductor, Mr. W. J. Cotton) gave artistic pleasure on December 6 by singing 'Strike the Lyre,' 'Lass of Richmond Hill' (arranged by the conductor), 'The Mighty Conqueror' (Webbe), 'A Franklyn's Dogge' (Bridge), 'Down in a flowery vale' (Festa), and 'Celia's charms' (Webbe).

The projected inauguration of a Devon Competitive Festival is referred to in the Competition Festival Record.

CORNWALL

Male choirs provide the greatest musical interest in Cornwall, and from the increasing number of such choirs it may well be hoped that the general singing culture of Elizabethan days will ere long return. Stithians Male Choir, trained by Mr. J. H. Bowden, gave a concert at Trevrea on November 15. A choir formed by Constructive Draughtsmen made its appearance at Torpoint on November 25, and sang Walford Davies's 'Hymn before action,' 'When evening's twilight,' 'The Beleaguered,' and 'O Peaceful Night.'

After several years of silence Penzance Orchestral Society made a reappearance on December 7, when Mr. Walter Barnes directed a band of thirty-five performers. The

'Raymond' overture, Sibelius's 'Finlandia' tone-poem, Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody,' Grainger's 'Irish tune from County Derry,' and Coleridge-Taylor's charming 'Othello' Suite were remarkably well played.

At Goldsmithy, on December 11, the Rev. J. Hartley Duerden lectured on Mendelssohn, and several local performers supplied illustrations.

DUBLIN

The pianoforte and violoncello recital at the Royal Dublin Society Theatre by Miss Annie Lord and Mr. John Mundy, on November 17, was much appreciated by a discriminating audience. The selections included items by Beethoven, Defesch (printed as 'Du Tesch' by one of the Dublin dailies), and Chevillard. Miss Lord is a pianist of distinction in Dublin circles, while Mr. Mundy is the recently appointed Professor of the violoncello at the Royal Irish Academy of Music. His playing proved that he was no unworthy successor of Mr. Clyde Twelvetees.

On November 24, Mr. Frederick Dawson gave a brilliant pianoforte recital, ranging from Bach and Beethoven to Cyril Scott.

Miss Dinah Copeman's pianoforte recital at Aberdeen Hall (Gresham Hotel), on November 26, displayed a considerable advance on her last year's performance. She promises to be an admirable executant.

At a meeting of the Leinster Society of Organists, on November 17, Mr. Sydney H. Lovett was congratulated on having secured a good post in England. He is succeeded as organist of St. Anne's by Mr. Lennox Braid, organist of Clontarf Parish Church, a well-known Dublin musician.

Dublin musical circles will miss 'the King of Irish pipers,' Denis Delaney, of Ballinasloe, who died on November 30, aged seventy-five. Though totally blind, Denis was a familiar figure at every yearly meeting of the Feis Ceoil since 1897, and he won first place at three-fourths of the pipe competitions; indeed, as an exponent of the Irish Uilleann pipes he was unrivalled.

The Rathmines and Rathgar Musical Society gave 'Merrie England' (in aid of the National Maternity Hospital) at the Gaiety Theatre during the week ending December 6. Although this popular light opera by Edward German and Basil Hood was produced in England eighteen years ago, it was not heard at Dublin till now. The principals, chorus, and orchestra did their parts well, and the piece was well staged under the direction of Mr. Arthur Cullen. Mr. T. H. Weaving, who conducted, had his forces well in hand, and is genuinely to be congratulated on the production.

As was to be expected, Mr. Gervase Elwes had a goodly audience at his song recitals at Aberdeen Hall (Gresham Hotel) on December 3 and 4. Notwithstanding the exacting nature of his programmes (he gave twenty-four songs at each recital), Mr. Elwes sang delightfully throughout.

The annual performance of 'Messiah' at St. Patrick's Cathedral, on December 5, attracted a large and appreciative congregation—but two familiar figures were sadly missed, namely, Dr. Charles Marchant (who has been organist for over forty years) and Mr. Charles Kelly, both seriously ill. Mr. W. E. Hopkins, however, did good work at the organ, and the vocal items received adequate treatment by Mr. Martin, Mr. Thomas Marchant, Mr. J. R. Morgan, and others.

Mr. Walter McNally's Celebrity Concert at the Theatre Royal, on December 6, brought us Madame Donalda, Mischa Leon, Ivor Foster, Michael Dore, and Miss Molly O'Callaghan—a goodly combination.

Mr. Frank Muspratt, organist of St. Mary's Cathedral, Limerick, gave an organ recital in the theatre of the Royal Dublin Society on December 8. His programme included Bach, Stanford, Maillly, and others. Among the many selections, Sir Charles Stanford's fine 'Verdun' Sonata won instant favour.

The December meeting of the Hibernian Catch Club (founded in 1680)—the oldest in Europe—was held on December 9, and was most successful. Mr. Thomas Marchant presided with his customary skill at the pianoforte.

It was a pleasure to attend the resumed concerts—suspended during the war—of Dublin University Choral Society, on December 12. Ever since 1837 this Society has done excellent work under Robinson, Stewart, and Marchant successively, and the programme presented—mostly by Mendelssohn—was well received. Dr. Figgis acted as a capable conductor in the absence of Dr. Charles Marchant.

EDINBURGH

The second of the Classical Concerts on November 15 was given by M. Alfred Cortôt, the distinguished pianist, whose first appearance in Britain was made at these concerts in 1907. His programme was an unusual one. It included the complete set of Chopin's twenty-four Preludes, 'Six Preludes' by Debussy, 'Seguidilla' by Albeniz, and César Franck's 'Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue.'

On the same date an equally refreshing programme of orchestral music was performed at the first Reid Concert conducted by Prof. Tovey. A tone-poem by Rimsky-Korsakoff, entitled 'A Fairy Tale for full Orchestra,' was a distinct novelty. Dvorák's arrangement of Brahms's two Hungarian Dances, Nos. 17 and 18, revealed these compositions in a new light. Miss Fanny Davies joined the Professor in Mozart's Sonata in F major for four hands, and contributed as a solo item Schumann's Concerto in A minor, Op. 54.

The second concert of this series, on November 29, was also most interesting. Prof. Tovey played Beethoven's fifteen variations and fugue on 'Prometheus,' Op. 35, magnificently. This composition was followed by the 'Eroica' symphony, the Finale of which is based upon the same material as the variations. Mendelssohn's orchestral version of the Scherzo from his Octet for four violins, two violas, and two violoncellos—that replaced the Minuet intended for the first Symphony produced in 1829—was a fine contrast to the other items.

At the third concert, on December 6, Mr. Charles Draper delighted the audience with a performance of two Clarinet Concertos. Stanford's work in A minor, Op. 80, and Mozart's in A major, gave the audience a unique opportunity of realising the extraordinary range of expression of which the clarinet is capable. A Symphony by Dittersdorf, 'The Fall of Phaeton,' was contrasted with Saint-Saëns's Symphonic Poem on the same subject. From these programmes one can see that the audiences at our concerts are being given unusual opportunities for comparing the development of musical orchestral expression.

The Paterson Orchestral Concerts were revived on December 1 under the conductorship of Mr. Landon Ronald. The programme was a popular one, but his fresh, vital readings were a delight. There was an entire absence of exaggeration in the interpretations. Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 was the chief number on the programme. At the second concert, on December 8, Mr. Harold Samuel was solo pianist, and here again we had the classical tradition revered. Beethoven's Concerto in G major received adequate treatment by both pianist and conductor. Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony was the other outstanding item of an excellent concert.

The Federation Military Band, conducted by Mr. G. W. Crawford, gave an enjoyable performance on November 15 of well-known works, and mention ought to be made of the appearance of a most promising young soprano at this concert, Miss Maud Campbell, of whom much may be expected.

On November 19 Miss Gertruida Van Vladeracken's Folk-Song recital was a charming exposition in a long and varied programme of specimens of Dutch, French, and British numbers.

The following well-known artists appeared at the third Quinlan concert on November 22: Misses Mignon Nevada, Astra Desmond, Margaret Cooper, and Messrs. Albert Sammons, Robert Radford, and Felix Corbett.

Mr. Max Mossel presented Mr. Watkin Mills, not heard for many years in this city, Miss Katherine Goodson, and Mr. Hubermann, who took the place of Jan Kubelik, on November 25.

Madame Helen Hopekirk, who is spending a year here after a long sojourn in the United States, gave a pianoforte recital on December 6, and included in her programme MacDowell's 'Keltic' Sonata. She will perform her Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra at the Paterson Orchestral Concerts later in the season.

It is gratifying to note that Madame Kennedy-Fraser, and her daughter, Miss Patuffa Kennedy-Fraser, drew a very large audience to their recital of Hebridean melodies on December 2. Too often is it that a city does not recognise the pioneer work of her citizens, but Edinburgh evidently does.

GLASGOW

The beautiful singing of Mr. Thorpe Davie's Ladies' Choir at Lonside Hall and at the Fine Art Institute showed that the Choir fully maintains the standard which secured for it first place at the last Glasgow Festival. The annual Scottish Concerts of the Orpheus Choir (Mr. H. S. Robertson, conductor) took place on December 8, 10, 11, 12, and on all four evenings St. Andrew's Hall was filled to overflowing with thoroughly appreciative audiences. In order to encourage native composers the Choir had offered prizes for part-song settings, the selected works receiving their first performances at these concerts. Among them were 'I'll gar our gudeman trow,' and 'Aye she kaimed her yellow hair,' by Mr. Francis G. Scott; 'Bonnie Lesley,' by Mr. Purcell J. Mansfield; 'The Captain's Lady,' by Mr. W. G. Whittaker; and 'The Heather,' by Mr. George Tootell. The other numbers included part-songs by Bantock, Robertson, Bainton, &c. The singing of the Choir was, as usual, superb.

The Choral and Orchestral Union's concerts were resumed on December 2, when the Scottish Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald, played a programme of familiar pieces. The personnel of the band is considerably changed, and unfortunately the numbers are reduced to seventy performers. At the first Saturday Popular Orchestral Concert, on December 6, Miss May Harrison gave a finished interpretation of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

The notable event of the month was the first performance by the Choral Union and Scottish Orchestra on December 9 (originally intended to be given at Sheffield in November, 1914), of Part I ('Pan in Arcady') of Bantock's 'The Great God Pan.' Mr. Bantock owes much to the libretto skilfully and poetically written by Mrs. Bantock, and the setting offers endless scope for the exercise of the musician's highest powers of imagination. Described as a Choral Ballet it fulfils all the conditions of such, its appropriate setting being the theatre, where scenery, dress, and action would fitly enhance the appeal of the music. Beginning with a choral prelude ('Invocation to Pan') written for a double choir, the work thereafter could be roughly described as having three main sections, the middle one, wholly orchestral, separating the other two which are set for four solo voices and chorus. In the long middle section are found (a) 'Revelry of Pan and the Fauns,' (b) 'Dance of Pan and the Satyrs,' (c) 'Revelry of Pan and Satyrs,' (a) 'The Wounded Faun,' and (e) 'Entry and Dance of Mænads,' which numbers could be taken from their setting and given as a purely orchestral piece. They contain some exceedingly beautiful music, and in the 'Entry and Dance of Mænads' the whole-tone scale is used with striking effect to depict the barbarity of the scene. Bantock's writing for the voices is orchestral in its freedom—indeed he seems merely to have made a concession to custom in expressing much of the vocal part in musical notation, the objective evidently being a dramatic rendering of the words. As vocal music it makes enormous demands on the singers' reading powers, and a wholly adequate performance is possible only by first-rate chorallists. At a first hearing the sections which seemed specially effective were 'The Echo,' 'The Wounded Faun,' 'The Moon,' and the final section ('Moon, Pan, and Chorus'), which provides a most satisfactory conclusion to what must be recognised as a remarkably fine composition. The score is richly coloured, and abounds in detailed expression marks, and at this the first performance, conducted as it was by the composer, we may conclude that an authoritative reading was given. Regarding the interpretation, it will be readily conceded that both band and chorus would have benefited by further rehearsals of so complicated a work. Nevertheless a good all-round performance was secured. The ladies of the chorus certainly excelled the men, who, notably in the comparatively simple 'Chorus of Hunters,' fell considerably short of doing justice to their part. As indicated above, a work of this kind demands a chorus of from a hundred to a hundred and fifty specially selected singers. The 'Invocation to Pan,' originally intended to be sung unaccompanied, was given with very good effect supported by the wind instruments. Mr. Warren T. Clemens, the able conductor of the Choral Union, is to be congratulated on the success he achieved with the forces at his disposal. His labours must have been most arduous. Of the solo vocalists Miss Nancy Weir (Echo), Miss Astra Desmond (the Moon), Mr. James Newall (the Shepherd), and Mr. Herbert Brown (Pan), the bulk of the work devolved on the last-named, who gave a very good reading of his part. No less satisfactory was Miss Desmond in the delightful music of the last section. Mr. Herbert Walton, as organist, had a small part in reinforcing the orchestra at places.

The second of the Mossel Concerts, on December 12, drew a large audience at St. Andrew's Hall. Mr. Max Mossel, who is remembered here as vice-leader of the orchestra under the August Manns régime, contributed some solos as well as taking part with Miss Myra Hess in Grieg's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in G major, Op. 13. Mr. John Coates was admirable as solo vocalist.

Mr. John Pullein continues his attractive monthly organ recitals at St. Mary's Cathedral. At the December recital the choir of the Cathedral took part, their singing of Boyce's beautiful 'By the waters of Babylon,' and Berlioz's 'Thou must leave Thy lowly dwelling' ('The Childhood of Christ'), providing agreeable variety to the instrumental numbers. The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company No. 3 fulfilled a three weeks' engagement at the King's Theatre.

HASTINGS

As an exponent of the more romantic and emotional type of symphony, Mr. Julian Clifford vindicated his reputation when he conducted on November 13 Dvorák's 'New World,' and on November 20, Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic.' Of the two composers Dvorák left the pleasanter impression. He was played with such an insight into the many beauties of his most familiar work that it was a joy to hear it again. Miss Lena Kontorovitch played Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto inimitably. True, her uncompromising methods would not suit every composer, but the Russian work need never look for a more virile and admirable performance. In the same composer's Andante and Finale for pianoforte and orchestra Miss Winifred Browne was handicapped both by the defects of the work and by her inability to infuse much life into it. Something more than pleasing tone in delicate passages is wanted in the equipment of an effective concerto player. The following Thursday gave us Beethoven's second Symphony—well played except for some carelessness on the part of the strings in the Larghetto and Scherzo. Mr. John Davies, the leader, established himself as a violinist of refinement and purity in Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnol.' Much was made of Franck's 'Le Chasseur Maudit.' Glazounov's gorgeous Symphony No. 6 received just the right treatment at the fifth concert. The very considerable proportion of right notes hit by Miss Bertha Vanner in Chopin's E minor Concerto were secured by means so mechanical as to make the work sound even more threadbare than it is. The same pianist found herself more at home in Stanford's seldom-heard Pianoforte Concerto, which she played three days later.

The sixth concert was notable for Mr. W. H. Read's dignified playing in Coleridge-Taylor's Violin Concerto. The Symphony was Dvorák's fourth, in which the bravura passages furnished many thrills; and there was a 'first performance'—a tone-poem called 'Taj Mahal,' by Captain Bertram Peck. The following day provided a pianoforte recital by Mr. Julian Clifford, when he played Saint-Saëns's Concerto in G minor, and many solos, including some clever numbers from his own pen.

At one of the Sunday Concerts Mr. Clifford played his own Pianoforte Concerto with great fluency.

The three Pianoforte Trios at Miss Annie Kenwood's first chamber concert, played by Mr. and Mrs. Kinsey and Mr. Paterson-Parker, approached the ideal for balance and rhythmic unity in their performance. Of their composers, Hurlstone, Friskin, and Bridge, the first stood out as he who will not be forgotten. Mrs. Kinsey's fine playing created a great impression in two Rachmaninoff Preludes. The second concert brought an admirable pianist in Mr. Harold Samuel, who joined Miss Kenwood in the Sonatas of Elgar and Franck. In the C minor Fantasia of Bach, Mr. Samuel, with a style essentially his own, showed what a really 'big' man he is, and what a Steinway ought to sound like. Miss Kenwood was more than equal to the exactions of Vitali's 'Chaconne.'

Among the choral works performed in December were 'The Last Judgment,' at St. John's, and Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' at Holy Trinity Church.

LIVERPOOL

Sir Henry Wood conducted the third Philharmonic Concert on November 25, at which there was an overflowing audience, mainly attracted presumably by the revival of Wagner music, of which Sir Henry's interpretations are so famous. Such familiar favourites as 'The Mastersingers' Overture, the Prelude and Death Song ('Tristan'), 'Siegfried Idyll,' and 'Ride of the Valkyries' afforded unrestricted pleasure. M. Cortôt, the famous French pianist, did all that is possible from the pianoforte point of view with Rachmaninov's third Pianoforte Concerto, which gave him a vehicle to display his extraordinary technical equipment. In Dr. Vaughan Williams's setting for chorus and orchestra of Walt Whitman's rhapsodical poem, 'Towards the unknown region,' which Dr. Pollitt conducted, the choir sang courageously if not with invariable confidence. The choral part is occasionally more orchestral than vocal. Dr. Vaughan Williams has successfully evolved music in keeping with the strangeness of the words, and near the end his treatment expands into a nobly-planned climax that carries conviction in its sense of inspiration.

Mr. Adrian C. Boulton, who is on his native heath hereabouts, made a welcome appearance as conductor of the fourth Philharmonic Concert on December 9. He had selected a choice programme, which included Schubert's ever-lovely 'Unfinished' Symphony, Mozart's 'Magic Flute' Overture, and Dr. Vaughan Williams's Overture 'Wasps,' a delightful work of broad melodiousness and vivid descriptive power. Miss Adila D'Aranyi played in Brahms's Violin Concerto in D, her performance being marked by abounding skill and high intelligence, if not by powerful tone. The vocalist, Miss Margaret Balfour, used her rich contralto voice with fine effect in the Alto Rhapsody by Brahms, and her singing reached a similar note of exaltation in Schubert's 'Hymn to the Almighty.'

If there could have been any possible doubt as to M. Cortôt's position among the world's greatest pianists it was dispelled by his wonderful performance at his first recital at Liverpool on November 29. A remarkable feature in his arduous programme was Debussy's twelve Preludes, in Book I. The concert-giver threw a clear light on these extraordinary conceptions, of which imitators may capture the manner but not the essence. Chopin, in twelve of the Studies, was just as finely played, finesse and delicacy, along with firmness of outline and nervous force where this was demanded, characterising the interpretations. César Franck's Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue was remarkable for the ethereal atmosphere imparted by M. Cortôt in the Prelude, and the recital ended with a brilliant performance of Schumann's 'Carneval.'

At the Rodewald Society's concert on December 8, Elgar's new Quintet, Op. 84, for pianoforte and strings, was heard for the first time. Played by the Catterall String Quartet, with Miss Beatrice Hewitt as pianist, it found ready acceptance and appreciation. At a first hearing it is strongly rhythmic music, broad in outline, rather more constructive than spontaneous in its appeal, but with greatness in its manner. Mr. Colles, in his able analysis of the Quintet in the November Musical Times, regards it as a work 'sustained by a single emotional impulse, multiform in its expression but constant in its aim.' It is an opinion which no doubt will be made clear by future performances. The Elgar work was preluded by Holbrooke's 'Belgium, 1915,' of which a re-hearing confirms it as an elegy of wistful and tender beauty, individual in its expression. The Brahms F minor Quintet completed an interesting programme, in which the pianist was an able coadjutor of the admirable quartet of strings.

The second Max Mossel concert in the Philharmonic Hall on December 6 drew a large audience to hear a good programme in which the concert-giver collaborated with Miss Myra Hess in an artistic performance of Grieg's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in G. The singers were Madame Stralía and Mr. John Coates, and Miss Ella Ivimey was a sympathetic accompanist.

It is seldom indeed that a new opera gives such genuine pleasure on a first hearing as did Reginald Somerville's 'The Miracle' (or 'Story of Antoine'), which was performed by the Carl Rosa Opera Company in the Royal Court Theatre on November 28 under the direction of Mr. Charles Webber. The composer, who is his own librettist, has fashioned a story from fisher-people's lives in a Breton village by the sea which quite sustains interest throughout the three Acts and offers occasional dramatic opportunities. The episode of the miracle where the blind Antoine is restored to sight rings, however, least truly. The great feature of the work is its invariable melodiousness and vocal qualities. No less an attraction is the orchestration, which is often strikingly felicitous in its suggestive touches of colour. The work and its excellent performance left a most favourable impression. Mr. Somerville's next essay in the direction of opera is awaited with interest. The principals included Miss Eva Turner, Miss Gladys Parr, Mr. Arthur Winckworth, Mr. Hughes Macklin, and Mr. Kingsley Lark. The chorus sang especially well in the beautiful unaccompanied music heard in the Prologue, and a final word of appreciation is due to the band, which was large and well balanced.

A new musical comedy, 'Cupid and the Consul,' was produced at the Playhouse on December 8, and had a week's successful run. The work is the collaboration of two clever men well known in local circles, the author being Mr. Percy F. Corkhill and the composer Mr. Edward Watson. The plot, in three Acts, is far-fetched, but the story hangs well together, and the book is smartly written. As may be expected from Mr. Edward Watson the music is very melodious and well scored. Conducted by Mr. G. F. Mason the Waterloo Operatic Society again proved themselves to be a highly capable body, and the performances really went beyond the usual standard attained by amateurs, who in this case include exceptional singers in Mrs. G. F. Mason and Mr. Reginald Ryder.

A successful music-making was that given by Miss Edina Thraves in Rushworth Hall, when this accomplished singer was heard in well-chosen songs. Miss Gladys Scollick (pianoforte) and Miss Kathleen Daly (violin) played well in Franck's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata.

The Wednesday musical afternoons in Crane Hall continue their popularity. That master of the keyboard, Mr. Edward Isaacs, gave a notable performance on December 3 of Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte Concerto, in which the orchestral part was ably played on a second pianoforte by Miss Dorothy Crewe. Her accompaniments to the songs sung by Miss May McLeod were of the robust order. At this recital the violin playing of Miss Jo Lamb was again noticeable for its executive skill and expressive qualities. Her gifts should carry her far.

Two interesting and instructive lectures on practically the same subject were given by Mr. Adrian C. Boulton 'The Art of listening to Music,' and by Dr. A. W. Pollitt on 'How to Listen to Music.' The first lecture was delivered before an open meeting of the Literary and Philosophical Society held at the Royal Institution on December 1, when Mr. Boulton had the able assistance of Mr. Frank Bertrand in pianoforte illustrations, which included Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 31, No. 2. The lecturer explained the plan of this work in a helpful way with the aid of a printed sheet of Musical Forms, a copy of which was supplied to each member of the audience. The desirability of being able to hear music intelligently was also emphasized by Dr. Pollitt in his lecture in Picton Hall on December 4 (one of the Corporation's free lecture series).

The Post-Office Choral Society, conducted by Mr. H. Goss Custard, sang 'Summer' and 'Autumn,' from Haydn's 'Seasons,' at their concert on December 10, and on the same evening the Musical Society of the University Guild gave the first of a series of concerts designed to develop a taste for classical music among the undergraduates. Conducted by Dr. A. W. Pollitt, the orchestra composed mainly, and the chorus wholly, of University students, comported themselves creditably, especially the orchestra, led by Miss Isabel McCullagh. Bach's 'Wachet Auf' proved a rather too ambitious choice for the chorus.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT

Returning to Manchester after an absence of two months in America—which, among other things afforded glimpses into the orchestral life of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia—one cannot fail to be impressed with the speedy return to normal conditions in the States as compared with Lancashire. In America, as with us, music in recent years has palpably tightened its grip upon the people of every class, but it was lamentable to come back to a Hallé Orchestra of sixty-five to seventy players after experiencing the full-voice bands in the States. I can hardly describe the feeling of depression aroused by this contrast at the first Hallé concert after landing. In a programme comprising the 'Freischütz' Overture, 'Tristan' Prelude and 'Liebestod,' and the Rachmaninof Pianoforte Concerto—all calling for the fullest string tone—the valiant efforts of our depleted ranks of string-players entirely failed to remove the sense of something lacking. The comparison is of quantity, not quality. In the States, as here, they have had their own peculiar difficulties, but Manchester must soon make up its mind that the time is now ripe for a return to the full-sized band when the string department was 16-16-14-12-12, instead of the meagre proportions of to-day. At the Opera House, where orchestral space is restricted, the limitations are inevitable. Not so, however, in our concert halls and at symphony concert performances. When 'Gerontius' was sung, on December 6, the sense of insufficiency was only intensified because in those wonderful divisi string chords accompanying 'This strange innermost abandonment, &c.,' the real effect was so imperfectly attained. It is surely not too much to hope that the executive (with Mr. J. A. Forsyth's happy restoration to convalescence) will be able to remedy this disability before the resumption of the second half of the season.

Whilst public support of all orchestral music continues to improve, which might seem to indicate that all is well, it would be folly to ignore the growth of the feeling in many well-informed and not unkindly critical quarters that all is not well with the body musical. Many makeshift arrangements have been accepted in the 'better half a loaf than no bread' spirit during the past five seasons, but now the cry should be 'his house in order.' With existing building conditions and the Housing Bill as we know it, there seems little likelihood of the Opera House scheme maturing in the near future. All the more need then for overhauling the orchestral and choral machinery, and renovating the wear and tear of the war period. It may as well be frankly recognised that there has been a relaxation of standards in choral performance and in the accompaniment of choral works. This was admittedly inevitable under war conditions; but the quality of singing on December 6 particularly made one wonder whether there might not be too easy an acquiescence in the possible permanence of difficulties which have faced all choral bodies in recent years. 'Gerontius' is still a virtuoso work calling for a chorus possessing the highest technical powers, not to mention its demands on interpretative abilities. The more exquisite the treatment of the intimate or more spiritual sections the greater the nobility imparted to the hymn, 'Praise to the Holiest.' I find the chorus chiefly deficient in this power of transition in moods so widely contrasted. Without this, 'Gerontius,' more perhaps than any other work, fails in its appeal. Mr. John Coates pointed the way in his reading of the title-part. With infallible judgment and touch he played on the instrument of human emotion. Mentally and visually he lived the whole scene with tremendous intensity of expression. But did the chorus of 'Assistants'? Were they not rather a somewhat casual band of onlookers? I believe this was the first time Mr. Gossens, jun., had conducted the oratorio. May it be suggested that his reading of the Introduction to Part 2, as played on December 6, is totally at variance with the indications of the poem—'An inexpressive lightness . . .'; 'hear no more the busy beat of time.' The italics are mine. The introduction of any emphasis into this gently undulating body of tone is surely to distort the poetical image; as nearly as such a thing is musically possible it should be rhythmless. The 'Demon Chorus' section was taken at a pace which sacrificed clarity and substituted the wholly different imaginative effect of turmoil. Again, was this the composer's intention?

A protest must be entered against the tendency, manifest in many quarters besides Manchester, of including in a 'Gerontius' evening a few items quite unsuitable to the occasion. If the work itself is deemed insufficient for an evening's music, let us at least be fastidious in the selection of works to be mated with this 'pearl amongst oratorios,' 'Leonora' No. 1, and two Roger Quilter songs, were absolutely unintelligent choices. Brahms's 'Alto Rhapsody' or 'Song of Destiny,' Strauss's 'Death and Transfiguration,' or one of Elgar's lesser-scale choral works are both adequate and in harmony with the spirit of the oratorio.

Miss Dilys Jones and Captain Heyner also sang, but with scarcely the same complete absorption in their respective parts.

It has seemed better worth while dwelling on the 'Gerontius' performance than on that of Berlioz's 'Faust' on November 22, when this work was given for the twenty-sixth time. Mr. Hamilton Harty conducted, and Messrs. D'Oisly, Pashley, and Randalow were the soloists.

Cyril Scott's Pianoforte Concerto was rehearsed for about an hour in the afternoon and then abandoned, as 'they [the management] find it impossible to produce the work with only one rehearsal.' This, in view of a recent happening with an Elgar Concerto at Queen's Hall, was a courageous sign of grace from one point of view, but quite inexcusable when it is remembered that the Concerto figured in the original draft programmes published last September, and both conductor and management must have been aware of its scope and the demands it would probably make upon rehearsal time. Without pushing the simile too far, one may suggest that delivery of the goods at the promised time is not an entirely negligible part of the contract with the public.

The Hallé Concert on December 11 was notable for some really gorgeous singing by Miss Agnes Nicholls.

Chamber music opened its doors at the Royal Manchester College of Music on December 4, to the strains of a Haydn G minor Quartet, played by the Brodsky combination. This is the twenty-third season of the Brodsky Quartet. The Haydn number was followed by Debussy's Pianoforte and Violin Sonata, in which Mr. Frank Merrick joined Dr. Brodsky. The Mid-day Concerts on Tuesdays and Fridays in Houldsworth Hall maintain a steady interest. Of local pianists Miss Lucy Pierce and Mr. Edward Isaacs bear the palm for programmes of continuous variety and efficient interpretative power.

The Co-operative Wholesale Society here runs a male-voice choir drawn from its employes, and now conducted by Mr. Alfred Higson, perhaps better known in choral circles as the director of the Sale and District Choir. On November 25, and again on December 10, in the Free Trade Hall, the singers showed that their ranks are quickly filling and that something is being done to win back the pre-war standard of efficiency. The so-styled Schubert-Liszt setting of 'Great is Jehovah, the Lord,' for solo, chorus, organ, and pianoforte, was carried through triumphantly by Miss Agnes Nicholls. Cyril Rootham's 'Coronach' and Bantock's 'Pibroch' were also in the programme.

Attempts are being made to re-invigorate the Manchester Diocesan Church Music Society. It is interesting to record that Dr. Bairstow, of York, was the chief guest at a recent gathering at the Rectory Club.

The Children's Concerts march from victory to victory—a great work, whose results will be manifest in future years.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE AND DISTRICT

The second of the four chamber concerts promoted by the Newcastle Bach Choir was held on Wednesday, November 19, when Mr. Lionel Tertis gave a viola recital, assisted by Miss Ellen Tuckfield at the pianoforte. The programme included the Romance from B. J. Dale's fine Suite, Brahms's Sonata in F minor, Op. 120, No. 1 (originally written for clarinet), and Grieg's Violin Sonata in C minor, Op. 45, No. 3. The viola has been undeservedly neglected as a solo instrument, and the superb playing of Mr. Tertis should do much to induce a greater number of instrumentalists, especially amateurs, to take it up.

On Monday, November 24, Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser lectured on 'Songs from the Hebrides.'

One of the results of the lack of suitable concert halls in the city has been to open the doors of the Cathedral to sacred choral performances. On Saturday, November 29, the building, which holds over two thousand people, was filled to hear a performance by the Bach Choir of three of the Church Cantatas of the great Cantor. The programme consisted of 'Ye mortals extol the love of the Father,' 'Lord, as Thou wilt,' and 'Ah God, how many pains of heart.' The numerical strength of choir and orchestra was as nearly as possible that for which the works were originally written. There was a choir of about three dozen, and two of each of the strings, one double-bass, two oboes, and organ. The soloists—Mrs. Robert Blades, Miss A. Lawton, and Mr. E. J. Potts—each gave fine renderings of their exacting parts, the first-named singing the tenor numbers in addition to her own. Probably the most striking choral item was the beautiful duet in the third of the Cantatas, 'When sorrow is prevailing,' sung by the ladies in chorus. The orchestra was led by Mr. Alfred Wall, Mr. William Ellis was at the organ, and Mr. W. G. Whittaker conducted.

On Wednesday afternoon, December 3, in connection with the Municipal Chamber Concerts at the Laing Art Gallery, Mr. E. L. Bainton gave a recital of pianoforte works by Bach, Daquin, Scarlatti, Ravel, Debussy, Ireland, Balfour Gardiner, Cyril Scott, and Chopin. There was a good attendance.

We are glad to note three resurrections this season: the Northumberland Orchestral Society, which mustered sixty-two members at its first rehearsal; the Central Hall Choral Society, which is preparing a Christmas performance of 'Messiah'; and the Northumbrian Chamber Concert Society.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT

Nottingham music-lovers have rarely if ever had such a feast of good things as has been recently provided for them. On November 16, Mr. Bernard Johnson's admirers heard for the first time his new Pianoforte Suite, 'Three Old-fashioned Dances.' The programme also included Bach's Toccata in F major, Schumann's B minor Study, and Lemare's Romance in D flat. The London Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald, attracted a large audience on November 19. The principal item was Beethoven's C minor Symphony, modern composers being represented by H. Balfour Gardiner, Délibes, and Stanford. Miss Myra Hess gave Rachmaninoff's Concerto in C minor, achieving great success in her work with the orchestra, as also in some Chopin solos. The Sacred Harmonic Society, at its opening concert on November 20, filled the programme with Gounod's 'Faust,' the singers sustaining their reputation by a particularly fine performance. The soloists were Miss Florence Mellors, Miss Lucy Goodwin, Madame Ethel Edgar, Mr. Frederick Blamey, Mr. Charles Keywood, and Mr. Norman Allin. On November 21, the Albert Hall was well filled, Madame Clara Butt and H.M. Coldstream Guard's Band proving irresistible lures to all classes of concert-goers. The Nottingham Gleemen, after the long hiatus of the war, made a welcome re-appearance on November 24, and under Mr. C. E. Riley gave a fine interpretation of Moler's 'Creation's Hymn,' Henry Hiles's 'Hushed in Death,' two part-songs by Elgar, and Danby's 'Awake, Æolian lyre.' The soloists were Miss Lucy Goodwin, Mr. Herbert Norman, and Mr. Albert Farnsworth. On December 3 Signor Busoni was heard with delight by a large gathering in a varied programme including Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata in F minor, Bach's 'Capriccio,' three Chopin items, and Liszt's 'Rhapsodie Hongroise' No. 13. The British Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Raymond Roze, on December 4, gave a programme of interest, embracing Rossini's ever-green 'William Tell,' Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, and the third movement of Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony. Mr. Watkin Mills (vocalist), M. Bronislaw Huberman (violin), and Miss Katherine Goodson (pianoforte) were cordially appreciated. M. Paul Frenkel acted as accompanist. On December 6 Mr. William Turner's Girls' Prize Choir was the main attraction. The Nottingham Philharmonic Choir was also heard in part-songs, the soloists being Miss Doris Carter, Miss Flora Webb, Mr. Sydney Coltham, and Mr. Herbert Lowe, and Mr. Hodgkinson gave some admirable violoncello solos. On December 7 Miss Helen Guest appeared, with Mr. Bernard Johnson, in Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor. Miss Guest afterwards introduced a group of four short works by modern composers, and Mr. Johnson gave organ solos by Horsman, Liszt, and Guilman.

After an interval of four years, the Chesterfield Operatic Society resumed its activities with seven performances of 'Merrie England' on November 24 and following evenings, at the Corporation Theatre. The singing of the solo and concerted numbers attained a high standard, the performances reflecting great credit on the director, Mr. J. Frederic Staton.

Mr. Gervase Elwes and Miss Una Bourne visited Derby on November 21, giving a chamber concert in the afternoon and providing the second Municipal Concert programme in the evening. Mr. F. J. Bonas (hon.-secretary to the Municipal Concerts committee) is to be congratulated on the success of the undertaking. Mr. Gervase Elwes expressed the hope that other towns would follow Derby's lead in this direction.

From Leicester comes news of an interesting pianoforte recital given by Madame Neville Russell, assisted by Captain Herbert Heyner, on November 24. Madame Russell's contributions included two Bach items and a number of modern works. Captain Heyner sang Arthur Somervell's song-cycle 'Maud'; also songs by Moussorgsky and John Ireland. Mr. Percy Jones was a sympathetic accompanist. The Leicester Maternity Hospital benefited considerably by this extremely successful venture. On December 11 the Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. W. J. Bunney, gave Elgar's 'Spirit of England,' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise.' The soloists were Miss Rosina Buckman and Mr. Maurice D'Oisly.

OXFORD

The Professor of Music, Dr. H. P. Allen, gave a lecture on Bach's Mass in B minor to a large and appreciative audience in the Sheldonian on November 29. He described the origin of the work, and outlined the known history of its early performances and late re-discovery. The lecture was instructive, and derived additional interest from the fact that the Mass was in preparation for performance a few days later by the Oxford Bach Choir under Dr. Allen's direction. The performance took place, also in the Sheldonian, on December 7. The large chorus, with ranks refilled, was in excellent form, and evidently took artistic pride in surmounting the difficulties of this truly great work. Space does not permit of detailed description. Suffice it to say that the Gloria, Credo, and Sanctus were sung with notable effect, while the Et Resurrexit, following immediately upon the wonderful Crucifixus, came out with irresistible brilliance, force, and charm. The rehearsals for this unique endeavour had been late and long, and also, it may be added, frequent, but all was amply repaid in the results achieved, for with such an enthusiastic chorus and the genial Professor-conductor, it seems possible to accomplish almost anything. The soloists were Miss McLelland, Miss Sibyl Cropper, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Topliss Green, who acquitted themselves well. Mention should also be made of Mr. Aubrey Brain's musicianly playing of the difficult horn obbligato in the Quoniam tu Solus, and of the capable leadership of the orchestra by Miss Venables, along with her able presentation of the two violin obbligati.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT

Dr. Coward has specialised in his interpretation of 'Messiah,' as all the North of England knows. Even nowadays, when much of its novelty has faded, the annual performance by the Sheffield Musical Union generally finds a few young conductors present making notes and registering impressions. This year they found the eminent chorus-master in good form, and his choir as large and competent as ever. As time goes on, the reading of the work which caused so much discussion nearly twenty years ago has become modified. There are fewer exaggerations, and such point-making as is retained has generally an artistic justification. The choir sang brilliantly, forceful volume coupled with extraordinary control of dynamic expression being the outstanding elements of the performance. The soloists were Miss Ida Cooper, Miss Lottie Beaumont, Mr. Sidney Coltham, and Mr. Hamilton Harris. Mr. J. H. Parkes led the orchestra, Mr. W. H. Peasegood was organist, and Mr. Colin Wilkinson solo trumpeter. Prior to the performance Dr. Coward, who recently completed his seventieth year, was made the recipient of a spontaneous and cordial greeting that congratulated him upon his continued health and vigour.

The coming to Sheffield of Sir Henry Hadow as Vice-Chancellor of the University has had an immediate effect upon the collateral musical activities of that institution. Under the auspices of the University Musical Society a series of four chamber concerts has been arranged at which the Catterall Quartet are the performers. The first was given on December 12, when the works played were Beethoven in E minor, Op. 59, No. 2, the second of the 'Rasoumovsky' set, Dittersdorf in E flat, and Schumann in F. The particular qualities of Mr. Catterall and his associates are an almost ultra-refinement of tone and great subtlety and finesse of expression. These were in evidence in all the works played, but more particularly in the Schumann Quartet. It was exquisitely done.

Busoni played at the third of the Wilson Peck Subscription Concerts. The hall was crowded, and the recital created a deep impression. Alike in Bach (the 'Departure' Capriccio), Beethoven (Appassionata Sonata), Chopin (fourth Ballade and other pieces), and Liszt (13th Rhapsody and 'Faust' Fantasia) he was his own virile, intellectual, monumental self. In his hands the music was a plastic to be wrought into novel moulds of thought and feeling, and by his dominating personality and the wonders of his amazing technique made to sound inevitable and correct. His Chopin playing has the admiration, if it has not the endorsement, of all Chopin lovers.

The Eva Rich Ladies' Choir produced Dr. Harold Darke's elegiac cantata 'As the leaves fall' at one of the Victoria Hall Saturday concerts. Under the composer's direction the large, well-trained choir sang the scholarly and often emotional music with deep feeling.

The Sheffield Teachers' Opera Society gave a successful week at the Lyceum Theatre, performing German's 'Tom Jones' to large audiences. Mr. Revill Slater was 'producer,' and Mr. Linfoot conducted.

On November 19 the Leeds Choral Union, under Dr. Coward, gave an excellent all-round performance of Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah'—which, by a singular coincidence, the Leeds public had the opportunity of hearing the very next day in operatic form by the O'Mara Company. Dr. Coward's chorus was very capable indeed, but the outstanding feature of the performance was the fine dramatic singing of Mr. Frank Mullings in the title-rôle, which produced quite a sensation. The other principals were Mr. Frederic Austin and Mr. Herbert Parker. Mr. Eugène Goossens conducted the Leeds Saturday Orchestral Concert on November 22, when a programme of thoroughly popular classics was given, including Beethoven's C minor Symphony and Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, the soloist in the latter being that very charming player, Miss Myra Hess. The next concert of the series was on December 6, when Mr. Hamilton Harty was the conductor, and was responsible for an excellent performance of Glazounov's C minor Symphony, the popularity of which inclines one to wonder that concert-givers never, or rarely, venture upon any others of his symphonies. Mr. John Dunn was the soloist in Beethoven's Violin Concerto. A welcome novelty was a little piece by a native composer, Mr. Herbert Howells, whose 'Puck's Minuet' for strings is a very agreeable trifle. On November 20 the Leeds Bohemian Concerts began a new season with a quartet which has changed its leadership, Mr. Alex. Cohen having gone to Birmingham, and his place being taken by Mr. Bensley Ghent, the other members being Mr. Dyson Perkins, Miss Lily Simms, and Mr. Arthur Haynes. The first of Beethoven's 'Rasoumovsky' quartets, Ippolitov-Ivanov's A minor Quartet, and Ravel's Quartet in F, formed the programme, which was played with much spirit. At the Leeds Philharmonic concert on December 3, the Hallé Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood's direction, was heard in a rather 'snippy,' but enjoyable programme, in which the most sustained piece was Max Bruch's G minor Violin Concerto, the solo part in which was most artistically played by Mr. Sammons. The sixth Orchestral Suite which Sir Henry Wood has so cleverly arranged from various compositions by Bach more than justified the process by its extreme effectiveness. All but the most fossilised purists will trust he will continue to add to the number of these adaptations—which, after all, are only what Bach himself did. Vaughan Williams's 'Wasps' Overture was another interesting feature in the concert. The Leeds New Choral Society, on December 10, gave Bach's 'Sleepers, wake,' also a condensed version of 'Elijah'—a work which very rarely undergoes the process of cutting. The principals were Miss Hilda Naylor, Madame Holroyd, Mr. J. W. Hepworth, and Mr. William Hayle. Mr. Turton conducted a performance which, though discounted by the absence of an orchestra, had many good points. An artistic and enjoyable recital was given on December 4 by Miss Marion Keighley Snowden (pianoforte) and Miss Etty Ferguson (vocalist). Miss Snowden played a number of modern pieces—Russian, French, Spanish, and English—and Miss Ferguson's choice of songs also inclined towards modernity, the exception being a group of old Italian airs possessing great charm. Both these young musicians are very accomplished artists, and their performances did full justice to the exacting task they had set themselves. On December 12 a newly formed string quartet party, the Bensley Ghent Quartet, began a series of concerts at which it is proposed to introduce some rather out-of-the-way works. The first programme was, however, not exceptional in character, although none the less excellent, consisting of String Quartets by Haydn and Beethoven (Op. 18, No. 6), and some movements from Quartets by Tchaikovsky and Godard.

BRADFORD

At the Bradford Subscription Concert on December 5, the Hallé Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Eugène Goossens, was heard in a programme the most sensational thing in which was the Suite based on Stravinsky's 'Oiseau de Feu,' which had not before been heard at these concerts. It was not new to the orchestra, however, nor to Mr. Goossens, who secured an admirable performance of the strange, erratic music. Mr. Lamond's powerful reading of the solo part in Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Concerto was another important item in the programme, while the late George Butterworth's Rhapsody, 'The Banks of Green Willow,' was a welcome tribute to native art. On November 21, the Bradford Festival Choral Society gave a very spirited performance of Berlioz's 'Faust,' with Miss Desirée Ellinger, Mr. d'Oisly, Mr. Charles Knowles, and Mr. W. Lovell as principals. On November 28, the Edgar Drake String Quartet gave the first of a series of Chamber Concerts, and showed much efficiency in Quartets by Haydn and Elgar, and Gade's Pianoforte Trio in F, in which Mr. Edgar Knight was the pianist. At All Saints' Church, which has acquired a musical reputation through the efforts of its organist, Mr. C. Stott, there was heard, on December 11, Spohr's 'Last Judgment,' a work which has sadly outgrown its one-time popularity, yet hardly deserves the neglect into which it has fallen. Mr. Stott did good service at the organ, and the soloists were Messrs. Wilkinson and Fisher, a choir-boy, Weston, undertaking the soprano numbers.

OTHER TOWNS

On November 20 the Halifax Choral Society, which has passed its centenary, gave evidence of renewed youth in a very praiseworthy performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' under Mr. C. H. Moody's direction, the soloists being Miss Rosina Buckman, Mr. John Coates, Mr. Charles Tree, and Mr. F. H. Bentley. On the following evening the first of the Halifax Chamber Concerts took place, the Catterall Quartet being heard in Quartets by Brahms (C minor), Elgar, and Mr. Speaight's Shakespearean 'Fancies.' On December 4 the Halifax Madrigal Society gave a concert which furnished several examples of the unique efficiency it has reached under Mr. Shepley's training. Weelkes's 'As Vesta was' represented the old school, Bantock's arrangement of 'The seal woman's croon' the modern, local art having its example in a 'Hymn to Peace' by a Queensbury musician, Mr. E. A. Moore, which had considerable interest.

On December 10 the Wakefield Choral Society gave 'Elijah' under Mr. H. H. Pickard's direction, and with Miss Eva Rich, Miss Goodacre, Mr. Wilfred Hudson, and Mr. Charles Tree as principals. At one of the Huddersfield Music Club's concerts, on December 10, M. Vladimir Rosing gave one of his characteristic and highly dramatic recitals. On November 29 the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society visited Ripon Cathedral to give, under Mr. C. H. Moody's direction, an excellent performance of 'Messiah.' Thanks to the generosity of the president of the Society, Sir Charles Sykes, the performance was free, save only for the moral obligation to contribute to a collection, so it is not surprising that the Cathedral was crowded. The principals were Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Olga Haley, Mr. Herbert Teale, and Mr. Edward Woodhouse. The accompaniment was represented by strings and organ (Mr. H. A. Bennett). On December 4 Brahms's 'German Requiem' was given in the Cathedral with purely local forces, the Cathedral choir being augmented by the Ripon Choral Society, and the solos being taken by Mr. E. Woodhouse and a number of the choirboys. Mr. C. H. Moody conducted a reverent and generally satisfying performance of this noble work.

Another untimely death I regret to report is that of M. Brahý, the very able conductor of the Concerts Populaires, Brussels. These music-makings are more or less parallel with those given by our symphony orchestras at home. It is understood and expected that M. Messager, the well-known composer, will conduct the next concert. M. Brahý's post is also one that will be exceedingly difficult to fill.

Erlanger's opera, 'Aphrodite,' has now been staged at 'La Monnaie' with considerable success.

Madame Edvina was accorded a splendid welcome on her return to 'La Monnaie,' her singing in 'Louise' and 'Tosca' being a real joy, only surpassed by her wonderful acting. During the performance of 'Louise,' in listening to the singing of Madame Edvina (Louise) and Madame Richardson (the Mother), it was inspiring to remember both are British subjects, and although naturally they sing with a slight native accent, the defect is lost in appreciation of their delightful artistry.

M. Kuhner played four Violoncello Sonatas at his concert on December 9, viz., Beethoven in F, Fauré in D minor, Debussy in D minor, and one by Joseph Jongen, an altogether charming composition, with a very expressive slow movement.

M. Scharres, the well-known pianist, gave an interesting recital on November 16. He has a welcome tendency to include a fair share of 'first performances' at each recital.

Madame Nilba gave a vocal recital on November 18, all the items of which were of the modern French School. She was assisted by M. Scharres (pianoforte), M. Deru (violin), and M. Kuhner (violoncello). The instrumentalists collaborated in a first performance in Belgium of Ravel's Trio in A minor.

On November 27 the young violinist, M. Desclin, gave an excellent programme, which included Dvorák's Concerto.

Concerts here recently have been many and varied. Not the least notable event was the programme presented at the 'Cercle Artistique' on November 28, in honour of the visit of representatives from the British Universities. Purcell's 'Golden Sonata,' for two violins and pianoforte, was played with much charm and delicacy by M. Deru and M. Piery (violins) and M. Scharres (pianoforte).

ROME

With Peace comes a promise of better things in the world of musical journalism in Italy. For the last two years the only musical publication at Rome has maintained an uncertain life with the fortnightly appearance of—one leaf! A really good musical journal, however, has not existed since the cessation of Messrs. Ricordi's excellent Musica e Musicisti some years ago. It is pleasant to note that the same celebrated firm is the pioneer in the resuscitation of our musical Press, and from Milan comes a specimen copy of their new review, Musica d'oggi (Music of to-day). Excellently printed on good paper, comprising thirty-two pages, and costing 50 centesimi, the review includes, besides excellent leading articles on musical problems of the day, a good collection of provincial news and a copious bibliography of recent publications, while announcing also a prize competition.

Another new venture comes from Ventimiglia, viz., a monthly publication devoted to sacred music, and appropriately entitled Musica Sacra. Aiming rather at the issue of new compositions than at the more literary production of criticisms, &c., it nevertheless includes four pages of letterpress, and, with the advantage of having a French edition simultaneously at Monaco, ought to do much to increase interest in the branch of music to which it is devoted.

THE CINEMATOGRAPH AND MUSIC

Some of my readers may remember my remarks on this subject in the Musical Times of August, 1918. Writing on that occasion of Mancinelli's symphonic poem 'Frate Sole,' I drew the conclusion that, whilst a musician is in no need of cinematographic interpretation, the general public is apt to regard musical commentary in the light of a distraction to their enjoyment of the film. The truth of these remarks

Musical Notes from Abroad

BRUSSELS

By the death of M. Kufferath, Belgium loses one of the most brilliant and capable entrepreneurs who has ever directed the fortunes of 'La Monnaie.' He died suddenly on December 8, and it will indeed be difficult to worthily replace him. Not only was he a very able and far-seeing business man, but his artistic temperament was responsible in no small degree for the many splendid operatic successes at Belgium's National Opera House. Curiously enough, on the eve of his death, the first number of a paper called L'Art Belge contained an article recalling an interview with M. Kufferath, in which he set forth his plans and hopes for the future. The article revealed an interesting point concerning his intentions, namely, that Wagner's works should certainly be accorded their place amongst the classics, and it was his (M. Kufferath's) ambition, in fulness of time, to present the 'Ring' drama in its entirety. He leaves many friends and many more admirers. It has been decided that until the close of the present season M. de Thoran and M. Van Glabbeke shall act as co-directors.

was forcibly demonstrated at the Costanzi on the evening of November 28, when another symphonic poem was presented to us with cinematographic interpretation, namely, the new work 'Fantasia bianca' (The white fantasy) of the popular Roman composer, Maestro Vittorio Gui. Let it be said at once that the first place was given to the music. The promise of the composer was to present a symphonic poem in three parts, with some cinematographic incidents worked in, as it were—an undertaking that he faithfully fulfilled. But it was just this that displeased. The crowded audience was about equally divided between the platea public which had come to hear the music, and the amphitheatre and gallery public which had come to see the cinematograph. Naturally the latter was dissatisfied, and testified its discontent in the time-honoured way, with results that threatened to be unfortunate for the music and for those who desired to hear it.

But perseverance and good humour on the part of composer and orchestra at length won over even the gallery, and the musical portion of the work—or, rather, the symphony itself, because the film was useless to everybody—gained an unequivocal success. And the music was worth hearing. Admirably executed under the composer's direction, the new poem revealed itself as full of well-harmonized variations and perfect musical descriptions whilst the orchestration was but another proof of Signor Gui's now established talent.

At the moment of writing there comes to hand the 'cartellone,' or winter programme, of the grand opera season at the Costanzi, which will be initiated with Mascagni's 'Iris' on December 18. There are seven novelties, foremost being 'Il piccolo Marat' of Mascagni and Zandonai's 'La via della finestra,' to which reference is made in the Milan notes in the Musical Times of October. There follows 'Anima Allegra' (The Joyous Soul) of Vittadini, 'Madame Sans Gêne' of Giordano, 'L'uomo che ride' (The laughing man) of Pedrollo, 'Mina,' by Alaleona, and 'Sumitra,' by Pick Mangiagalli. The repertory works include 'Andrea Chenier,' Puccini's 'Tabarro' trilogy, 'Thais,' 'Boris Godounov,' 'Manon' of Puccini, and Massenet's work of the same name, 'Falstaff,' 'La forza del destino,' 'La Traviata,' 'La Gioconda,' 'Barbiere di Siviglia,' and 'The Valkyrie.' The management is evidently still somewhat uncertain concerning the propriety of presenting German opera at Rome. Turin, on the contrary, has already taken a bold lead in this respect, and very shortly after the opening of the present season presented 'Lohengrin' to an enthusiastic public, whilst 'Tannhäuser' is in rehearsal. I had the good fortune to assist at 'Lohengrin' at the Chiarella Theatre at Turin a fortnight ago. It was the fifth or sixth performance of the opera, but the theatre was crowded, the public enthusiasm showing no sign of decreasing. The music was excellently performed, yet it must be owned that dramatically the interpretation of the work left a good deal to be desired. A contrast especially noticeable was the fine singing of Lohengrin and the same gentleman's remarkably wooden acting. Also the opera suffers considerably from its translation into Italian—a defect noticeably marked in the Bridal Chorus, where the words are sadly mutilated to fit in with the music. Yet for all this, it was a good presentation, although one felt that the Italian genius had not been able to overcome many difficulties inherent in the German character of the work, and this fact I realised very keenly when, on the following evening, I assisted at a really superb presentation of Catalani's 'La Wally.' Here there was no longer the arduous forcing of foreign material into an Italian atmosphere, but a perfect interpretation of a native work by native artists.

Apocryphal Catalani, two of his operas are being much represented in Italy this year—'La Wally' and 'Lorely.' But how is it that we never hear his 'Dejanice'? I have not learned if this work is very well known in England; here it is entirely shelved. Yet it is his masterpiece, and his own favourite composition, that never won the success it deserved. Catalani himself, in a letter (I believe to Giulio Ricordi) said: 'The little fortune which this work has met with is among the greatest sorrows of my already sufficiently sorrowful existence.'

Curiously enough, as I despatch these notes, I hear from the management of the Regio Theatre at Turin that it is proposed to exhume 'Dejanice' this year in that city.

LEONARD PEYTON.

CAMBRIDGE

For the statutory concerts this year the University Musical Society put down Bach's B minor Mass, which was given on December 5, and a miscellaneous concert in May-week when Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'Sea Symphony,' Dvorák's Violoncello Concerto and Delius's 'Appalachia' will be performed. The series of chamber concerts has been revived, and five have been arranged for the year. On October 29 the Bohemian Quartet played Quartets by Haydn (C major, Op. 33, No. 3), Beethoven (E flat major, Op. 127), and Dvorák (D minor, Op. 34); and on November 19, Messrs. André Mangeot, Georges Pitsch, and Ralph Lawton gave a recital of modern French music and Bach's B minor Sonata for violin and pianoforte. Next term Mr. Gervase Elwes is to give a song recital and the Philharmonic Quartet a string quartet concert. In May, Schubert's Octet and Brahms's Clarinet Quintet will be performed under the leadership of Mr. Haydn Inwards.

The Musical Club membership has increased so much that another room has had to be secured for the weekly concerts. Many schemes for development are being discussed, though the chief items of concern at present are the inadequacy of the premises in Petty Cury and the difficulty of finding bigger ones.

The College Musical Societies are full of activity, and the private musical clubs, such as the Scales Club of Caius, the Lady Clare of Clare, and the Benet Club of Corpus, hold their weekly or fortnightly concerts as usual.

In connection with the formal installation of Mr. Balfour as Chancellor of the University, a performance is to be given in King's Chapel in May-week next, when the programme will consist very largely of works by English writers.

Cortôt gave a pianoforte recital in the Guildhall on November 10, and Miss Jean Sterling Mackinlay sang folk-songs in costume on November 18.

Miscellaneous

The Philharmonic String Quartet gave two concerts of British music at the Salle Gaveau, Paris, on November 22 and 26, with the following programmes: First concert: Eugène Goossens, Quartet, Op. 14; Holbrooke, Three songs with accompaniment of pianoforte and strings (vocalist, Mr. John Goss); Frank Bridge, Three Idylls; Holbrooke, Symphonic Quintet, Op. 44 (pianist, the composer). Second concert: Elgar, Quartet, Op. 83; Cyril Scott, Quartet; Arthur Bliss, Quintet for pianoforte and strings, 'To the city of Bath and three friends met therein' (pianist, the composer).

We learn that the British Music Society Year-Book and Catalogue has assumed unexpectedly large dimensions, and will be published early in January. It will be supplied free of cost to all members of the Society, and now that the membership card carries such wide advantages as admission to all centres in the United Kingdom and on the Continent, together with the Bulletins posted free of cost to all members, the subscription is fixed for professional and amateur members alike at a guinea a year. The first Annual Congress, to be held in May, will provide lectures, concerts, meetings, a reception, and a banquet.

Several well-known soloists will take part in a concert organized by the Phoenix Musical and Dramatic Society to take place at Queen's Hall on the evening of January 28, in aid of St. Dunstan's Hostel. Tickets are obtainable from the hon. secretary of the Society at Phoenix House, London, E.C.

We regret to record the death of Mr. Thomas Pierce Waddington, at the age of eighty-two, well-known in Leicester for a prominent career as vocalist.

The general financial report of the Falkirk and District Choral Union for the sessions 1915-19 is a remarkable record of charitable work. The net sums paid over to various organizations amounted to £19,633, of which the East Stirlingshire Prisoners of War Fund received £7,596 and the Scottish Red Cross £4,804.

The 'Spring Musical Festival' of the London Sunday School Choir is announced to take place on March 27 at the Royal Albert Hall, with a choir and orchestra of twelve hundred, and Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Robert Radford, and Mr. Evelyn Edwards as soloists.

Mr. R. J. Pitcher, Mus. Bac., has been appointed by the London County Council as special lecturer on 'Musical Appreciation.'

Recent activities of the Blackheath branch of the British Music Society have included a concert of works by Mr. Lawrance A. Collingwood, given on November 28.

DR. RALPH H.

BELLAIRS' Melodic and Rhythmic Primer FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

The Aim of this Primer is to eliminate Mechanical Drudgery.

In this Primer every effort has been made, as far as possible, absolutely to avoid the unmelodious, and by doing so, to awaken intelligent and appreciative interest from the first day of study.

All exercises, scales, and arpeggios are arranged on a Rhythmic Basis, the importance of which cannot be over-estimated.

The sense of rhythm and the sense of melody are carefully fostered from the very outset. These two factors should, in the case of a beginner, outweigh the mechanical element, which is only too often allowed to take first place in the educational scheme.

Ample provision is made for solo practice, but in order to avoid monotony, the elementary melodies, scales, and exercises, all of which must be practised solo, have been arranged in duet form, so as to provide the necessary variety from mere solo practice, which is apt to become perfunctory and valueless in the early stages of musical training.

All the parts allotted to the student are designed for solo practice, but they will gain immeasurably in value by frequent recourse to the duet arrangements, in which the sympathy and experience of the teacher render such real assistance to the young beginner.

For practice in sight reading and accompaniment, the more advanced pupil should play the teacher's part.

A WESTMINSTER PILGRIM BY SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE.

Three-hundred-and-sixty pages, Large Demy 8vo, with a Frontispiece in Colour by Sir LESLIE WARD, numerous Illustrations, and a Special Portrait of the Author by Sir WILLIAM RICHMOND, K.C.B., R.A.

CLOTH, GILT, SIXTEEN SHILLINGS NET.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

THE TIMES.

As his writing is full of illustrations of his own cheerful character, so the book is appropriately full of illustrations, drawings, and photographs, showing him at all ages, the Cathedral churches in which he has worked, his predecessors and successor at the Abbey, and all the persons and things who have "pleased him mightily."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

This cheery book . . . is playfully anecdotal . . . The author of these pleasantly written recollections . . . has much of interest to unfold.

MORNING POST.

There are many illustrations. One plate consists of portraits of the fourteen organists of Westminster Abbey since 1549, and there are numerous other pictures of interest. The whole is something more than a book of reminiscences; it can be read with interest by the non-musical, and can be turned to by the historian for light shed by an authority.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

Under the happy title of "A Westminster Pilgrim" Sir Frederick Bridge has narrated in a vivacious manner many of the most outstanding events of his distinguished career. The volume has qualities which make it an important contribution to the history of music in England.

EVENING STANDARD.

The book must be read to be appreciated. Stories wrenched from their context do less than justice to the personality which pervades the volume.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Sir Frederick Bridge's retirement from the organ-loft at Westminster Abbey has enabled him to complete a delightful volume of reminiscences. Is a most readable book—a big one, too. Every page bristles with good things, and it would take much space to do justice to them even in a general survey.

EVENING NEWS.

Sir Frederick Bridge's own story of his long life in the service of the Church and its music is told at length; and a very beautiful spirit of devotion to his life's task runs through the pages.

SATURDAY REVIEW.

An autobiography of the chatty, gossip order. . . . It deals now and again with serious musical topics, more particularly, of course, those which have come within the orbit of the author's own wide professional experience; and when it does so it is not only interesting, but instructive and valuable.

SPECTATOR.

Makes excellent reading . . . there are many pleasant and humorous stories.

REFERER.

The volume is exceptionally interesting reading, not only to musicians, but to all who trace social progress. It is also of considerable intimate historical value, and incidentally a useful reference book, as it is excellently indexed. I should add that it contains many artistic illustrations and portraits.

GRAPHIC.

This handsome autobiography . . . is a very readable and happy book.

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

Will interest all readers of contemporary autobiography. It is a book of high spirits and not unduly concerned with the art of music. Rather, it is the record of a man who has enjoyed with great good-humour all the phrases of life he has touched and the personages with whom he has come in contact.

ATHENÆUM.

A pleasant and amusing record of a peaceful, busy life . . . his reminiscences are told lightly and with humour.

CITY PRESS.

A more chatty autobiography has not been published for a long while . . . is deeply interesting.

HUNTLY EXPRESS.

Not for a long time have we read a more charming or delightful volume. It is a story once taken up cannot be laid down until it has been wholly gone through. From the first page to the last there is not a dull or uninteresting paragraph. As an autobiography it will rank amongst the best-known works of this kind which have ever been given to the reading public. As a reward book it should be kept in mind by all school authorities—educational or musical.

CHURCH FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

A charming book. Readers will see that "A Westminster Pilgrim" is a very pleasant companion, whose gossip will cheer other pilgrims for many days to come.

GUARDIAN.

A singularly pleasant and companionable book.

MUSICAL HERALD.

So long in preparation, has been worth waiting for. One would not recommend a protracted reading at one sitting; the scenes change too rapidly. But that is just the charm of the book for a busy musician. Pick it up and read a few pages at random, and you will want to repeat such pleasure again and again.

ORGANIST AND CHOIRMASTER.

This is indeed a notable book, and one which stands—and probably will stand—somewhat by itself in the whole range of English autobiographical literature; . . . it is full of humour from cover to cover.

MUSICAL NEWS.

The reader of this delightful volume has the somewhat rare experience of perusing a life-story without wondering whether he has chanced to stray into some advertisement columns.

MUSICAL STANDARD.

Concerning the book itself, it ought in justice to be added that it is a very full record of an active musical life. It is admirably arranged, excellently printed, and copiously illustrated. The "get-up" generally is all that could be desired, and one handles it with infinite pleasure.

MUSIC TRADES REVIEW.

From first to last the book is of intense interest. It is of great historical value . . . and makes exceedingly pleasant reading . . . Music-lovers must not consider their libraries complete until this new volume has been added.

LADY'S PICTORIAL.

A volume of exceedingly chatty reminiscences.

THE QUEEN.

Nothing could be more sprightly—genial.

ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

Readers may be assured of finding in the book a wealth of intimate information regarding a little-known side of music and many things of interest to the non-musical. The excellent reproductions of the portraits of eminent musicians are a feature of the volume.

NOTTINGHAM GUARDIAN.

Within its 349 pages he has packed an infinite variety of reminiscence, told with a raciness of style and a command of expression which impart great effect to the extremely interesting events of which the volume treats, and which all types of readers will find of absorbing interest.

SHEFFIELD TELEGRAPH.

It is a portly volume, filled with good stories.

YORKSHIRE POST.

A very entertaining volume of reminiscences. More than a conventional word of praise is due to the publishers for the excellent appearance of the volume, which has no vestige of war economy about it, and has many appropriate illustrations, artistically reproduced.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

The Weber Small Grand Piano

*Length:
4 ft. 10 ins.,
Width:
4 ft. 10 ins.*

This instrument is the latest product of the famous Weber factory at Hayes, Middlesex. It is a triumph alike for its producers and for British craftsmanship, for never have any foreign makers succeeded in obtaining so rare a tone in an instrument of such limited proportions. Less than five feet in length, it occupies almost the same space as an ordinary upright piano, but has all the advantages of tone and appearance that characterise the Grand type of piano ::

The tone of the Weber Concert Grand Piano has made that instrument the choice of the world's chief pianists, and in this miniature model all the beauties of the Weber tone are preserved. This wonderful new piano may be seen and played in our showrooms; it is obtainable upon easy payment terms that make it as accessible as an upright piano.

ROGERS

There are other Pianos more widely advertised and better known than the Rogers; but there is none that is so irresistible in its appeal to the musician.

The Rogers Piano represents the careful development of an artistic ideal, and the musician is quick to realize the possibilities it offers him in its delicacy and responsiveness of touch and variations of tone-colour.

Marshall & Rose

SUPERB GRAND & UPRIGHT PIANOFORTES

THE PIANOS WHICH INSPIRE

THOSE who purchase the Superb Marshall and Rose Pianoforte can always be confident that their instrument will win the highest measure of praise on account of its superlatively sympathetic qualities. The Marshall and Rose Pianoforte in the making has been treated with the same care and tenderness as a rare violin; it is the supreme outcome of years of experience and steady striving after an ideal; every part of it has literally been trained towards perfection, and the result is an instrument which is almost human in its responsiveness.

The artist who avails himself of this wonderful instrument as a means of self-expression will find that his message never fails in its appeal when given to an audience in such an exceptional manner. Real connoisseurs of Music are convinced that the magic and beauty of the immortal works of the great Composers can only be adequately realised when interpreted on the Piano of Perfection—the instrument which bears the name of MARSHALL AND ROSE.

The Marshall and Rose Grand and Upright Pianofortes can also be obtained containing THE WORLD-FAMED ANGELUS PIANO-PLAYER, which gives you a Piano possessing every musical quality and the ability to play it.

SONGS OF DISTINCTION

The Harvester's Night Song Poem by FOSTER RICHARDSON Music by H. BAYNTON-POWER

First introduced to the public by Mr. NORMAN ALLIN. This song has established its claim amongst the first favourites of all contralto and baritone vocalists.

Think Tenderly of Me Words and Music by VERNON SHARP

Although very simple in construction, this little "heart song" has made an immediate and direct appeal. Miss ADA FORREST, Mr. ALFRED HEATHER, and Mr. GERALD O'BRIEN amongst other eminent artists regard it as one of the gems of their repertoire.

The Message of the Rose Words by ED. OXENFORD Music by MAY HUNTER

The many admirers of Madame ELSA STRALIA who have heard her rendering of this gracefully written song on a COLUMBIA RECORD, are unanimous in praise of its "quaint old English charm."

Rest at Eventide Words by HAROLD SIMPSON Music by H. BAYNTON-POWER

Admirers of the "Harvester's Night Song" will welcome this new song by the same composer. Again we have an exceptionally fine lyric with an underlying philosophy, set to a melody that faithfully reflects its message.

For the above may be had from Music Dealers throughout the Kingdom or direct from Publishers, post free 2/1 each.

CHARLES TREE.

MR. TREE CAN BOOK EN-ROUTE DATES FOR LECTURE-RECITAL.
SHREWSBURY "OUTLOOK," Dec. 10.—"A packed house, overflowing to the orchestra, awaited the famous baritone for his return visit with Recital-Lecture. His singing was magnificent, the lecture most interesting and instructive. There was a remarkable demonstration at the close of the evening, and he sang three extra songs."

BURNLEY EXPRESS, Dec. 6.—"He explained in a most interesting way the definite means to obtain that singing which is comparatively rare, yet absolutely indispensable to vocal art and to the long life of the voice."

How many voices in these days stand the wear and tear of 15, 20, and 30 years? Very few. The reason is almost entirely due to wrong placement. Telling the pupil to "get it more forward" does not give the definite means to do so. It is this lack of the definite which is the cause of such loss. Mr. Tree shows the definite many times during each lecture.

BERKLEY'S "FAUST," HALIFAX, Nov. 20.—"The sarcasm one expects was brilliantly accomplished. His inflection and phrasing artistic throughout. The malignant proddings at the hopeless Faust were cruelly faithful."—Guardian.

application to Mr. Bates.

PIANO PLAYING KEPT UP without keyboard practising.

Not the least of the many benefits which the use of my System confers upon pianists is that of being able to keep "in practice" without keyboard practising.

Even when circumstances make keyboard work impossible for several months, definite progress is often made in touch, increased powers of execution, and in general command over the keyboard.

This is one of the many reasons why pianists of all grades of proficiency should take my Postal Course.

Sir Frederick Bridge, C.V.O., has strongly recommended my System, the advantages of which, he stated, he could cordially endorse from his own personal experience. More than 12,000 successful students add their testimony.

"From Brain to Keyboard"

Macdonald Smith's System
of Pianoforte Playing.

My illustrated book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing," will be gladly sent to any pianist. It fully explains the principles and advantages of the methods used in the System. When applying, please state whether comparative beginner, average or advanced pianist. The book will be sent free of charge, and post free.

M. MACDONALD SMITH, 19, BLOOMSBURY SQUARE,
LONDON, W.C. 1.

Do not impoverish the musical soul within you by persistence in arduous out-of-date systems which yield such poor results for weary hours of drudgery.

The Three T's of the Successful Pianist

(Technique—Touch—Tone)

A Course of Correspondence Lessons sheds a new light on Piano playing, awakens the enthusiasm of the student, and leads, by natural and logical methods, to the attainment of a perfect and effortless technique.

A STUDENT WRITES:

"I am an enthusiast of your system, having proved, for myself, the immense benefit of it. It is rational and inspiring, it raises piano playing from useless drudgery to intelligent and absorbing artistic enjoyment—in short, it demonstrates how meaningless, irritating noise can be changed into true harmony of sound, which it is the real object of music to accomplish."

Pianists should write for free booklet, stating, in confidence, their difficulties, or whether Beginner, Moderate, or Advanced player, to:—

DR. RALPH H.

BELLAIRS' Melodic and Rhythmic Primer FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

There is in existence a multitude of pianoforte tutors, all of which follow well-known and stereotyped lines, which are rather out of date in the light of modern educational developments.

The "MELODIC AND RHYTHMIC PRIMER," by Dr. Bellairs, breaks essentially new ground, by making a definite appeal to the sub-conscious as well as to the conscious mind of the musical beginner.

No dry-as-dust finger exercises or scale studies are employed. Against such, the pupil naturally rebels, and only negligible progress results.

The basis of music being melody, harmony, and rhythm, it is obvious that a correct educational plan must embrace all three.

Ear and imagination need training as well as hand and fingers, which have hitherto had the lion's share of attention.

The object of this "PRIMER" is to eliminate drudgery by stimulating interest from the very outset.

FEBRUARY 1 1920

MUSICAL TIMES PRIZES

The proprietors of the MUSICAL TIMES offer two prizes, of the value of Twenty-five Guineas each, for the best composition of—

- (1) An anthem for four voices: soprano, alto, tenor, and bass, with organ accompaniment.
- (2) A part-song, without accompaniment, for four voices: soprano, alto, tenor, and bass.

The words chosen for setting should be either non-copyright, or the option of using them must have been secured by the composer.

No composition, when printed, should exceed in length eight pages of the MUSICAL TIMES, wherein the successful anthem and part-song will appear.

The copyright of the prize compositions will become the property of the prize-givers. The right to withhold the prizes is reserved if none of the compositions submitted attains a good standard. At the same time, the proprietors may negotiate for the purchase of the copyright of any unsuccessful work.

Competitors should keep in mind the average capacity of good choirs.

It will be an advantage if the words selected are unhackneyed, wide in their appeal, and of undoubted poetic merit.

The authorship of each composition must be indicated only by a motto or nom-de-plume written at the top of the manuscript; such motto or nom-de-plume must also be written outside a sealed envelope accompanying the composition and containing the name and address of the composer.

The awards will be made known in the April issue of this journal.

Compositions, which must be received not later than March 1, should be addressed to:

THE EDITOR OF THE MUSICAL TIMES,
160, Wardour Street, Soho,
London, W.-1,

and endorsed 'MUSICAL TIMES COMPETITION.'

THE ENGLISH FOLK-DANCE SOCIETY

In the life of every movement there comes a stage when some kind of stock-taking is called for. The first flush of enthusiasm has waned, the merely curious have dropped astern, and the wet-blanket and cold-water merchants have done their worst. With growth new problems have gradually arisen—problems in regard to organization, finance, and (a specially awkward one at this moment) accommodation. Such a stage has apparently been reached by the English Folk-Dance Society. The school held at Chelsea during the Christmas holidays aroused so much interest and led to so many inquiries that we feel sure some account of the Society's objects, present condition, and future arrangements will be useful to our readers.

The Society was founded in 1911 'to disseminate a knowledge of English folk-dances, folk-music, and singing games, and to encourage the practice of them in their traditional forms.' From the first its policy has been to make haste slowly. It has made a great point of the training of teachers, and so has been able to seize such openings as have occurred from time to time—a much wiser plan than forcing the pace and creating a demand beyond its power to meet. Much of its success is due to the continuous and widespread nature of its activities. Realising the importance of that blessed word 'decentralisation,' the Society has established branches all over England—there are some even in the United States—at which classes and demonstrations are held practically all the year round.

GROWTH OF THE MOVEMENT

In considering the progress of the Society we have to bear in mind that it had been established only three years when the war broke out. Many of its local branches had to suspend work, and its activities in general were necessarily reduced. Nobody would have been surprised if the movement had succumbed to such a check. The most that could be expected of it was a bare survival, followed by a period of convalescence and marking time while awaiting the return of normal conditions. The best proof of the Society's vitality is the fact that although normal conditions are still a long way off, it has grown so much since the war and its services are in such demand that the executive is hardly able to cope with the situation. Here are a few figures showing this growth. An important part of the Society's work has been the holding of vacation schools. The first of these schools was held at Stratford-on-Avon in 1911, about fifty students being present. At the school held at Chelsea recently there were no less than four hundred enthusiasts from all parts of the country. Between 1911 and the end of 1918 five hundred and seventy students passed the various examinations for certificates. In 1919 this number was increased by over two hundred and fifty. A good deal of steady spade work goes to the making of such an increase as this, and the reader will not be surprised to hear that the central weekly classes held in London last term were attended by five hundred pupils. In addition, weekly courses were held in the suburbs—Kensington, West Ham, Ealing, Greenwich, Hammersmith, &c.

During the war the Society supplied twenty teachers (under the leadership of Miss D. C. Daking) to the Y.M.C.A. for work behind the lines in France and at rest and convalescent camps. A full account of this successful venture appeared in the Music Student for December, 1918. The work amongst convalescent soldiers in England is too well known to need more than mention. Thousands of men derived benefit from folk-dancing, and as a result a large number of demobilised soldiers are joining the Society and its classes. The dances are now very generally taught in Elementary Schools throughout the country, and are practised by girl guides, boy scouts, girls' clubs, women's institutes, and other social organizations.

ITS CHIEF NEEDS

This rapid growth has brought about the problems mentioned at the beginning of this article. The Society is badly in need of suitable headquarters, larger offices, a library, museum, and, above all, class-rooms and a large hall. At present over £500 per annum is being spent in renting halls and class-rooms, and even at this heavy cost the right kind of accommodation is difficult to obtain.

ENGLISH BALLET IN THE MAKING

The repertory consists of ninety-five Morris Dances, a hundred and twenty-five Country Dances, and eighteen Sword Dances, all of which are published in instruction books. The technique of English Folk-dance is very elaborate, especially that of the Morris and Sword type. When a knowledge of this technique becomes general some interesting developments may be looked for. It is possible—even probable—that one of the results may be an English Ballet. A step in this direction was made at the Chelsea School, when an enjoyable feature was a Mock Ballet performed by members of the E.F.D.S., and produced at the Margaret Morris Theatre. In this were parodies and 'guys' of all kinds of people and things, from Mr. Cecil Sharp to the Russian Ballet. The music—a medley of folk-tunes cunningly woven by Mrs. Shuldham Shaw, who also wrote and produced the Ballet—deserves special mention.

THE CHELSEA SCHOOL

We quote the following from an account of the School published in the Daily Telegraph of January 3:

One would not be far wrong in guessing that to-day in Chelsea at least four hundred young people are sorry Christmas is over. . . . Are you aware that Chelsea has been performing, as it were, a wonderful symphonic ballet of its own that has taken six days to perform? Do you know that those six days have been days of joy and energy and laughter and music and sweetness and splendid activity to those four hundred people? Let me explain the unusual situation in a word. Those happy people you have met have been to school during the holidays! . . . And what sort of school can that be? It has a rather solemn title that might make you think hardly of it: The Vacation School of Folk-Song and Dance, London. But it is really not a solemn school, and though the prospectus looks severely business-like—at the head of it you read, 'The English Folk-Dance Society: Hon. Director, Cecil J. Sharp'—with its time-table and programme of winter session, it contains some of those elements that made our ancestors talk of Merrie England. . . . Do you know, or have you ever heard of, 'Bobbing Jo'? That's a six-hand Morris that sets you tapping the floor with the heel of your boot and in a couple of minutes humming the tune. Do you know 'Hunting the Squirrel'? That's a stick-dance, old-world and quaint and as graceful as can be, and Mr. Sharp will tell you, if you ask him why it is called 'Hunting the Squirrel,' that the old folk-song makers and players called any old thing that if they were at a loss for a title. Do you know 'Old Molly Oxford'? That's a jig to set your feet a-tingling. Or 'Ruffy-Tuffy' for four dancers, or 'Mage-on-a-chree' for eight dancers, or 'The Boatman' for six? If you don't know any of these things you merely haven't lived, and if the tune of 'The Boatman' doesn't catch you by the heart-strings then you must be one of those people old Shakespeare cared little for. . . . If you suffer from ennui, if you are depressed, if you have lost faith in Merrie England, just go to school—in the holidays.

We reproduce two photographs taken at the Chelsea School.

An interesting volume might be written on the part played by chance—a random word, a coincidence, a casual meeting—in the origin of important movements. Thus Mr. Cecil Sharp, the founder of the Society, tells us that the present revival of folk-dance was due to his chance meeting with Mr. William Kimber at Headington, Oxford, on Boxing Day, 1899. Mr. Kimber was playing for the Headington Morris Men, and Mr. Sharp was among the spectators. From the start the movement has had the great advantage of expert advice from Mr. Kimber, and the fact was suitably recognised at Chelsea. Mr. Kimber had been specially invited in order to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the commencement of the revival. The veteran having danced a couple of jigs in his inimitable style, was called to the platform, where, in the name of the students, Mr. Sharp presented him with a pocket-book containing a substantial cheque.

FUTURE ARRANGEMENTS

The 1920 Easter Vacation School will be held at York, and the Summer School at Cheltenham. The removal from Stratford-on-Avon to Cheltenham is owing to the need of greater lodging accommodation and more class-rooms than were available at the former town.

The Easter Term of classes in London commenced on January 19 and ends on March 27. The classes are held at the Swedish Gymnastic Institute, 16, Paddington Street, Baker Street, and at Reeve Hall, 76, East Street, Baker Street, on the evenings of Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday, and on Saturday mornings. The syllabus may be had on application to the secretary, Miss Elsie W. Austin, 7, Sicilian House, Sicilian Avenue, W.C.1.

THE ARTISTIC VALUE OF ENGLISH FOLK-DANCE

The physical and recreational benefits to be derived from the practice of folk-dance are too obvious to need setting forth. Indeed, they have perhaps somewhat obscured the artistic value of the movement.

This article cannot end more fitly than by drawing attention to a couple of enthusiastic tributes to its artistic importance,—tributes the more valuable because they come from widely different sources. The first will be found in our correspondence columns, in a letter from Mr. Tobias Matthay. The second is a quotation from an article in the New Statesman of August 30, 1919, from the pen of Mr. W. J. Turner—a critic who is not given to rash praise of his country when art is concerned:

Many people have heard of the English Folk-song Society who have never seen a performance of any of Mr. Cecil Sharp's pupils, and I am sure that to those who have not seen their dancing it comes as a revelation. A demonstration was given on the lawn in the grounds of the Memorial Theatre by eight dancers, with Miss Avril as violinist and Mr. Sharp at the pianoforte. As a great admirer of the Russian Ballet I must honestly declare that never at the Russian Ballet have I seen anything so beautiful. On the grass one got pure movement without a sound except from the instruments. The effect was extraordinary. So perfectly in time and so liquid were their movements that one could have almost wept for pleasure. No one who had not seen it could imagine the pure loveliness of the Morris Jig ('Heart's Desire') danced by a single girl dancer. It is impossible to over-praise the work Mr. Cecil Sharp has been doing. It has been taken far too much for granted in the past, but I hope future producers of Shakespeare's plays will consult Mr. Sharp, for I am sure it will be to the advantage of the theatre.

MR. WILLIAM KIMBER, HEADINGTON MORRIS

How enthusiastically we should hail any foreign dancers of whom such words as the above were written! And what a pity it is that the director has such a painfully abrupt and English name as 'Sharp!' A few more syllables and a sneeze at the end would make it an asset of untold value to the Society.

ELGAR'S VIOLONCELLO CONCERTO

By H. C. COLLES

Elgar's Violoncello Concerto (Op. 85) comes as a pendant to the chamber works in much the same way that the Violin Concerto (Op. 61) was a pendant to the first Symphony (Op. 55). The glow of his first symphonic creation was still on him when Elgar took in hand to write a violin concerto for Kreisler. He approached the work in the same buoyant spirit, and carried it through with the same exuberant delight in the construction of a big design from a wealth of highly coloured melodic tesserae. The Violin Concerto might be regarded as a second symphony with an important violino principale part.

When it was known that Elgar had composed a Violoncello Concerto, thought naturally reverted to the Violin Concerto and raised expectation of something in a similar vein. The work was performed, and the first impression was one of disappointment. It was a performance insufficiently rehearsed. Some people complained that the writing for the solo instrument was poor, others found that the orchestration was curiously thin. All these and many other things were said to account for the disappointment, and they had some truth in them, but those who disparaged the work most seemed to comprehend its standpoint least. Perhaps the composer had not quite realised his own standpoint. If he had he would not have employed an orchestra of the same size as that of the Violin Concerto: for the whole texture of this work is that of chamber music rather than orchestral music, of the sonata rather than the symphony. Its interest depends on the development of certain clearly defined melodic ideas used with more continuity than were those of the earlier works, but less arresting individually. Instead of the rich mosaic we have a pencil drawing, heightened by simple washes of instrumental colour, and the impression formed at a first hearing—that the amount of colour hardly justified the use of so large a paint-box—is confirmed by a study of the full score.

The Concerto is now published in an arrangement for violoncello and pianoforte by the composer, and has lost very little in the process. Anyone who has tried to play either of the Symphonies or the Violin Concerto in pianoforte arrangements knows how different is the case with them. However skilfully the thing may be done, one is always conscious of the makeshift, but here a good violoncellist and pianist can sit down to enjoy the music together and forget if they will all about the orchestra in a duet sonata. The general form of the work can be compared to those sonatas of Beethoven's middle period described as quasi una fantasia, which is as far from the traditional one of the Concerto as anything could be. The essential of Beethoven's form in the two Sonatas of Op. 27 is that instead of putting the greatest intellectual energy into a first Allegro he reserves such forces for the Finale, merely using the opening to set a mood and create an atmosphere.

Elgar's opening fulfils the same function with complete freedom from pretentiousness:

Ex. 1. Nobilmente.

The short recitative phrase for the violoncello is a motto reappearing in the later movements and also giving melodic suggestions for their principal themes. It is not dwelt on with any insistence in this its first shape, but the violoncello in an ad libitum ascending passage leads the way to the moderato first movement, the theme of which is outlined by the strings:

Ex. 2.

The gentle undulation of this melody, with its rhythmic regularity, takes possession of the score for the next thirty-six bars. Its six-bar rhythm, always divided into sequential passages of two bars each repeated in different shades of tone and different degrees of emphasis, is curiously uneventful; but this very fact serves its purpose in heightening the effect of the more broken rhythm when it appears in the next idea propounded by the clarinets and bassoons:

Ex. 3.

Even so slight a variation of rhythm as this becomes significant, and the phrase is susceptible of much melodic extension. The whole suggests the placidity of a quiet country in which the small details of foliage and the movements of human life seize the attention. Viewing the movement analytically, one cannot fail to regret the limitation which the constant employment of phrases of two bars imposes, but accepting this limitation, one is charmed by the varying melodic turns given to the melody which flows on in a scheme of quiet beauty developing the pastoral idea. That idea is further emphasised in the orchestration, in which clarinets and bassoons constantly alternate with the strings, while the solo instrument develops a free descant on the ideas which they suggest.

Like everything which Elgar writes, it hints at some personal experience of which we can share the feeling though not the facts. Shortly before the end of the movement the 9-8 rhythm of Ex. 2 returns, combining with that of the pastoral theme, and after one short climax of orchestral tone it sinks to a calm ending.

While the lower strings still hold the last note of the first movement, the violoncello breaks in with string pizzicato chords, suggesting the opening notes of the recitative, Ex. 1, and the second movement opens with a free passage in which such chords are contrasted with a fragment of what is to be its principal theme:

Solo. Allegro molto.

It asserts a more agitated feeling than anything which has preceded it. The whole orchestra joins in an impulsive accelerando and crescendo, which is answered by a fine declamatory cadenza.

The movement to which this leads is an allegro molto, in which the solo instrument is in the foreground, developing the idea of Ex. 4 with brilliant scale passages, using almost entirely the higher register of the instrument. The orchestration is exceedingly light, flutes and clarinets combining in duet passages with the soloist, and as in the first movement, although here the mood is more vigorous, the continuity of the texture is remarkable. The second subject itself makes its appearance as a conclusion of what has preceded it:

Ex. 5.

The figure A is immediately taken up by the orchestra and emphasised, producing a strong element of contrast with the perpetual movement of the developments from the principal theme.

Each time it comes it sheds a ray of strong light on the half-tones in which its surroundings are placed ; but again the movement is inconclusive. The light flickers and goes out in a Coda which seems intentionally designed to evade any suggestion of climax such as makes the conventionally-effective ending of a scherzo.

There is a silence before passing to the third movement. This is a perfect little miniature slow movement in B flat major, 3-8 time, some sixty bars in length. The solo violoncello and the strings are closely combined, and of the wind instruments only clarinets, bassoons, and two horns are used to give an occasional touch of colour. It is so continuous in design, that it would be impossible to quote a fragment as a representative theme. But for the fact that it ends on the dominant chord, it would be completely independent of its surroundings ; but this ending links it to the last movement.

As in the case of the Beethoven sonatas pointed to as a parallel in form, it is the Finale which sums up the purpose of the ideas suggested in the earlier movements.

The orchestra enters with a strong, dance-like rhythm, which the solo instrument presently shows to be connected with the recitative of Ex. 1 :

The recurrence of Elgar's favourite nobilmente direction identifies the mood of this recitative with the opening one, but the application of the term to such passages as these is in itself a change of view from what the earlier works suggested as his interpretation of nobility. Even in the Pianoforte Quintet nobilmente is associated with a grandiloquent manner. The passage where it appears shortly before the end of the Finale in that work is one where the strings present a version of the principal theme in a unison fortissimo ; but here nobilmente seems definitely dissociated from anything like a display of magnificence. The writer of the programme notes to the first performance (Mr. Henry Coates) said, 'As to the poetic and emotional basis of the work one has the composer's sanction for saying that it is perhaps appropriately expressed in the term nobilmente which is prefixed to the beginning of the score.' And since the whole work seems of set purpose to avoid the type of emotion with which Elgar used to associate the word, one can only feel that he is giving a more intimate meaning to it in applying it here.

The recitative is expanded into a stronger cadenza than that which preceded the second movement, so that each time it recurs as an introduction throughout the Concerto greater emphasis is laid upon it. It is cut short by a single chord on the full orchestra, and then the Allegro enters, the solo violoncello leading with the dance theme (Ex. 6a), now in E minor and expanded into an 8-bar tune.

With this idea the whole atmosphere of the work becomes clearer. Positive statement takes the place of elusive suggestion. One is reminded of the Finale of Brahms's double Concerto, not in any textual resemblance, but simply in this emergence into full daylight by the arrival of a sharply-cut rhythm. There are a number of contrasting episodes concerned in the development of the movement, amongst which the following is the most definite in its contrast of sentiment :

A flowing semiquaver figure for the violoncello, punctuated by light chords and figures of accompaniment on the strings and wood-wind, carries on the rhythmic design of the first theme and adds to its interest :

That first theme itself has a very extended development in the middle of the movement, in the course of which sweeping arpeggios over the strings of the solo instrument accompany modifications of the tune on the orchestra. A complete recapitulation, more brilliantly scored than the first statement, leads to a poco più lento, one of those extended Codas which are frequently amongst the most interesting features of Elgar's work.

The dance rhythm dies away upon a low C sharp, and the time changes to one of four slow crotchets. Over the rhythmical pulsations of this note, used as a pedal, the strings introduce a chromatic figure which is strongly insisted upon :

This is worked to a tense emotional climax, at the height of which the violoncello enters con passione with a phrase of melody which was important in the third movement.

It is treated in dialogue between the soloist and the full orchestra until, after a strenuous outburst of tone, a diminuendo dwells thoughtfully upon another feature from the slow movement, including a repeated rise of an octave in the solo part against a chromatically descending bass. All movement ceases upon a delicately poised dominant chord. Then the recitative (Ex. 1) breaks in practically in its original form. The dance rhythm (Ex. 6a) is resumed pianissimo by the orchestra, and with a rapid crescendo is carried quickly to a vivid ending.

This account has referred with some fulness to the instrumentation, although it was pointed out at the beginning that it is a much less conspicuous feature of the work than is usual with Elgar. The published pianoforte score gives very little indication of the instruments used, in fact the beginning of the second movement is the only place where instruments are indicated at all, and therefore it seemed that those who become acquainted with the Concerto through the publication might be helped by some description of its colouring. It is, for example, important to know that the third movement is scored for a very much smaller orchestra than the rest. Personally, I cannot help wishing that the whole had been treated as a work for solo and small orchestra, in fact as a chamber concerto of which we have so few modern examples. The whole style of the work would favour such treatment, and the balance of solo and tutti would be more surely found. Perhaps it is not too much to hope that without abandoning the original score the composer will issue some time an arrangement for small orchestra. A still more important consideration is that the work should be heard again in a performance for which every detail has been fully thought out. When this is done, and when it is listened to with the knowledge of its content that the published score can give, there can be very little doubt that the consistent beauty of thought which sustains it will be fully appreciated.

By EDWIN EVANS

VIII.—HERBERT HOWELLS

It is impossible to devote prolonged attention to British composers who have come forward during the last twenty years without becoming conscious of a strong endeavour, conscious in some, unconscious in others, to realise that peculiarly elusive quality which we term the English atmosphere. In so far as it is conscious it necessarily comes under the heading of nationalism, a word the abuse of which threatens to become a bugbear. Nationalism is not an ideal. It is at best a means to an end, which when the end is accomplished, loses its artistic value and, as we have seen with the Russian composers, is quickly dropped by those who feel sufficiently emancipated to dispense with it. It is an antithesis to internationalism which, properly understood, is an ideal condition for all art. But in music, internationalism has grown to mean two definitely opposite things. The development of musical history has burdened us with a false internationalism which consists in holding the door wide open to all that is German or in harmony with the German tradition, and keeping it barely ajar for whatever music may develop independently of that tradition. During the war this was commonly called being broad-minded, and if any of us criticised it, we were reminded that 'art has no frontiers.' It is not internationalism but imperialism which holds frontiers in such light esteem. Much of the greatest art in history has existed precisely by virtue of its frontiers. The ancient pride that divided culture into Hellenic and barbaric had no doubts about frontiers, but who can deny its fruitfulness? But there is a true internationalism which consists in awarding sympathetic attention to all artistic endeavour whatever the tradition may be to which it owes allegiance. That is the state towards which current musical opinion is striving, and in the transition from the false to the true internationalism, the temporary phase of nationalism has rendered incalculable services—services whose value outweighs the theoretical objections that one may have to the self-conscious, or even aggressive elements which helped to foster it. Such objections are frequently made, for instance, to the use of folk-song as thematic material, and they might be valid if the music which results from the technical exploitation of traditional material represented the final goal to which its authors were striving, but I know of no composer who so regards it. It is one of several means of transition from the false internationalism which had a peculiar regard for an idiom plainly though indirectly derived from German folk-song, to a true internationalism in which all idioms alike will be admitted to full citizenship.

It is necessary to bear these considerations in mind when turning to the work of Herbert Howells, as few of the younger composers are so much exposed to misinterpretation. His compositions are rich in traits which, whether they have any affinity with folk-song or not, are recognisably English; but if these were cited as evidence of nationalist tendencies, there is little doubt that he would promptly and energetically, if not wrathfully, dissociate himself from any such movement. There is no contradiction in this. There might have been twenty years ago, when it was practically impossible for an English composer to write, otherwise than self-consciously, music that was recognisably English. Then only those who deliberately avoided it could escape the classic idiom, and it is the weakness of nationalism that it is deliberate. Now the tyranny of idiom, if not completely broken, is so far weakened, that deliberate rebellion against it is no longer necessary for its avoidance. It is Herbert Howells's good fortune to have come forward at a time when the German idiom was available for those who liked it, but offered no special inducements to those who did not. It was not a case of rebellion, perhaps not even of choice. He merely sat down to write as he felt, and as he happened to be an Englishman, a great deal of what he wrote had an English tinge. The distinction is not a personal one. It belongs to the changed conditions. To write English music was an affectation twenty years ago, but a page of musical history has been turned over, and to-day it is affectation to write music which is alien in sentiment or idiom. Notwithstanding certain melodic devices which possess affinities with folk-song, Herbert Howells is no nationalist. There is still less ground for attributing a similar significance to his fondness for modal inflections; for though the folk-song enthusiasts frequently lay claim to them, it is in another context altogether that this young composer learned to love them.

The English atmosphere in Herbert Howells's work rests neither upon a characteristic melodic idiom, nor upon harmonic treatment, nor upon any other of the devices which constitute a composer's raw material. If it did, it would be less subtly true than it is, and our recognition of it as such would be a mere matter of external features. It lies deeper than that. Probably his circumstances have very largely conduced to it, for constant ill-health has compelled him to spend the greater part of his time at his home in the Forest of Dean, and the Gloucestershire countryside is a better school than any academy. This raises an interesting problem in criticism. He stands out among contemporary English composers as perhaps the most truly lyrical of them all, not merely in the sense of writing songs or lyrical melodies, but because his music really and truly sings where that of other composers is content to recite. His music is singularly free from rhetoric, and singularly rich in poetry. Now the problem is this: Did the countryside make him a lyrist, or is it because he was born one that he is so subtle an interpreter of the countryside? Such questions are really as incapable of reply as the famous riddle concerning the respective priority of the chicken and the egg; but it is not necessary for a question to admit of a reply for it to possess a fascinating interest. On the contrary, criticism delights in unsolved riddles.

The main characteristics are therefore a lyrical realisation of the beauties that unfold themselves to the eye of a tone-poet amid rural surroundings, a sense of openairishness combined with a feeling for distance that engenders a strain of mysticism, alternating with a healthy cheeriness which has a different ring from the gaiety of cities.

The combination of these qualities produces an engaging sincerity which, in these sophisticated days, might be regarded as ingenuous, but which is in reality the expression of a youth that has been spent in more natural surroundings than are the fortune of many of us. The most important of them, though not that which is most frequently indulged, is the mysticism for which perhaps remoteness were a better word. Sometimes it enters quite suddenly, with a feeling which recalls the sensation of glancing from a picturesque cottage in the foreground to the horizon far behind it. At other times it creeps in imperceptibly, and one realises that the atmosphere of the music is radically different from what it was a few pages back, without having noticed the transition. Perhaps it is then more attractive, for the poetical feeling takes one, so to speak, unawares, and tricks one into accepting its beauty as a matter of course, and as an inevitable consequence of a train of thought which at its inception was concerned with picturesque externals, or at best with a less detached mood. It is in these moments that Herbert Howells shows the best that is in him. It is here that he becomes, in the fullest meaning of the word, a tone-poet, for the greatest poetry of all despises mere anecdote except as a gateway to those remote things which are its true material. There are moments when the poetical feeling becomes so meditative that it seems to pass beyond the influence of purely musical considerations, but it would appear that the composer is alive to this, for, having plunged us for a moment into this dim remoteness, he quickly leads us back and concentrates our interest again on the main course of the music. His formal sense is too definite to allow him to lose his way in those dim regions, however fascinating he may find them.

Herbert Howells was born October 17, 1892, at Lydney, Gloucestershire. He is the youngest son of a large family, and grew up amid musical surroundings which became so intimate a part of himself that he finds it very difficult to say at which point his active interest in music commenced. In 1905 he became an articulated pupil to Dr. Brewer at Gloucester Cathedral, and he has since been assistant-organist at Salisbury. Unlike many young musicians, he extended his interests during these early years to various outside subjects, which enabled him to escape the narrowness that is a lamentable feature amongst students. To this his outdoor pursuits largely contributed. An Organ Sonata, composed in 1911, won for him an open free scholarship for composition at the Royal College of Music, where he studied theory with Dr. Charles Wood, composition with Sir Charles Stanford, and the organ with Sir Walter Parratt. Whilst at the College he secured the Sullivan prize, the Manns memorial prize, the Dove prize, a prize for extemporisation at the organ, the Tagore medal, the Bruce scholarship, and the Grove scholarship. Whatever value one may set upon academic distinctions, it is evident that he was an unusually brilliant student. In addition to the foregoing, he was frequently the recipient of the prizes awarded by Sir Hubert Parry for literary essays on musical history. Before he left the College in 1917, his Pianoforte Quartet had

COMPETITIONS IN 1920.

The quick revival of the Competition movement to something approaching its pre-war activity is gratifying. Probably of all forms of music-making choral singing was the worst sufferer from war conditions. Nothing could more effectively resuscitate the choral life of the country than the stimulus of competition. Last month we printed a list of forty Festivals announced to take place this year. That list has now grown to forty-seven, and doubtless there are other events of which we have no information. We have heard that the great Blackpool Festival is to be renewed during the autumn, but no particulars are yet to hand. We notice that a new competition has come into being at Edinburgh. The following list gives all the information we have received as to dates, names and addresses of secretaries, and names of adjudicators:

ABERDEEN.—April 24. Dr. J. R. Elder, 189, Westbourne Road, Aberdeen. Adjudicator, Mr. David Stephen.

AYRSHIRE (KILMARNOCK).—April 23-24. Mr. Robert D. Wood, 81, King Street, Kilmarnock.

BALLYMENA.—May 4-7. Mrs. W. Wier, 4 Mount Royal, Portrush, Ireland.

BIRMINGHAM (THE MIDLAND FESTIVAL).—May 8 to 15. Messrs. G. J. Bowker and F. W. Stevens, Queen's College, Birmingham. The names of the thirteen adjudicators, and a complete list of the test-pieces, were given in the Competition Festival Record for October, p. 80.

BRIGG (North Lincs.).—April. Mr. Edward S. Brown, Thornholme, Brigg, Lincs.

BRISTOL.—June 21 to 23. Mr. W. E. Fowler, 8, Elmdale, Tyndall's Park, Bristol.

CARLISLE.—February 10-12. Mrs. Nigel Buchanan, 29A, Aglionby Street, Carlisle. Adjudicator, Prof. H. Walford Davies.

CLEETHORPES.—July 2, 3. Mr. S. G. Dilnot, Council Offices, Cleethorpes.

COLERAINE.—May. Mrs. Huston, Ulster Bank, Coleraine, Ireland.

CORNWALL.—May. Lady Mary Trefusis, Falmouth. Adjudicator, Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson.

CROYDON.—March 8 to 13. Syllabus from Mr. Thomas Cook, Music Warehouse, 28, George Street, Croydon.

DORSET CHORAL ASSOCIATION.—Miss F. Kindersley, Clyffe, Dorchester, Dorset.

DOVE AND CHURNET VALLEYS (ASHBOURNE).—April 20. Mr. F. Rawlinson Wood, Denstone College, Roster, Staffs.

EDINBURGH.—May 20, 21, and 22. The Secretary, 27, George Street, Edinburgh. Adjudicators, Mr. H. Plunket Greene, Mr. H. S. Robertson, and Dr. R. Vaughan Williams.

ESKDALE.—May 11, 12. Miss May Yeoman, Woodlands, Sleights S.O. Adjudicator, Dr. A. Somervell.

FEDERATION OF WORKING GIRLS' CLUBS, LONDON.—March 27 (Drapers' Hall) and April 10 (Clothworkers' Hall). Miss G. M. Tottenham, 26, George Street, Hanover Square. Adjudicator, Mr. Harvey Grace.

FIFE, KINROSS AND CLACKMANNAN (KIRKCALDY).—April. Mr. J. T. Davidson, Solicitor, 150, High Street, Kirkcaldy.

GLASGOW.—April 30 to May 8. Mr. R. P. Graham, 187, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow (from February 1). Adjudicators, Prof. Granville Bantock, Prof. H. Walford Davies, Mr. Ernest Newman, and Sir J. Forbes-Robertson.

HASTINGS.—May 17-20. Mr. John Lockety, 47, Havelock Road.

HULL AND EAST RIDING.—May 14, 15. Mr. S. H. Clark, 29, Coltman Street, Hull. Adjudicators, Dr. R. R. Terry and Dr. E. Markham Lee.

KENDAL (THE MARY WAKEFIELD WESTMORLAND FESTIVAL).—April 14-16. Messrs. Colin & Gordon Somervell, Netherfield Works, Kendal. Adjudicators, Prof. H. Walford Davies and Mr. George Rathbone.

KENT (CHATHAM).—May 15 and 19. Mr. Leslie B. Mackay, 378, High Street, Rochester. Adjudicator, Mr. Harvey Grace.

KENT (WEST).—Miss R. Turnbull, The Mill House, Hildenborough; Miss E. P. Pechey, Homeleigh, Tonbridge.

LEAMINGTON.—May. Mrs. Bernard Green, 175, Rugby Road, Royal Leamington Spa.

LEAMINGTON.—June 3, 4, 5.

LEITH HILL.—Mrs. Edward Tatham, Towerhill Manor House, Gomshall.

LINLITHGOW.—Mrs. Mackenzie, Longcroft, Linlithgow.

LONDON MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVAL.—March 13-20. Mr. T. Lester Jones, 130, Belgrave Road, Wanstead, E. 11.

LONDONDERRY.—May 9-12. Mrs. A. Stewart, Holly Lodge, Londonderry. Adjudicators, Mr. H. Plunket Greene, Dr. E. C. Bairstow.

THE MANX FESTIVAL (DOUGLAS).—Mr. W. A. Craine, North Cliff, Douglas.

MEXBOROUGH (YORKS).—April 8, 9, 10. Mr. R. Spowage, 6, Pitt Street, Mexborough. Adjudicator, Dr. Brewer.

MID-SOMERSET (BATH).—May 19-22. Mr. H. Bowen, 13, Daniel Street, Bath. Adjudicators, Mr. Geoffrey Shaw, Mr. Martin Shaw, Madame Edith Hands, and Mr. Cecil Sharp.

NORTH NORTHANTS (OUNDL).—April 23, 24. The Lady Lilford, Lilford Hall. Adjudicators, Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, Mr. C. J. King.

NORTH NOTTS (RET福德).—April 21, 22. Mrs. Herbert Peake, Bawtry Hall, Retford, and Mr. J. F. D. Dimock, 19, Churchgate, Retford. Adjudicator, Mr. Geoffrey Shaw.

OAKLANDS CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH (SHEPHERD'S BUSH).—February 12. Mr. Harry S. Anderson, 29, Sedgeford Road, W. 12.

PEOPLE'S PALACE (E. LONDON).—February 26 and 28, May 4-15. The Rev. C. J. Beresford, 392, Commercial Road, E. 14. Adjudicators, Mr. T. Dunhill, Mr. Harvey Grace, Mr. Granville Humphreys, and Mr. C. Kennedy Scott.

PETERSFIELD (HANTS.).—April 20-22. Miss Grace Hoskyns, Bedhampton, Havant, Hants.

PORTSMOUTH (Welfare Association for the Young).—April 26-30. Mr. J. Herbert Fisher, 66, Gladys Avenue, Portsmouth. Adjudicator, Mr. Harvey Grace.

SLIGO.—April 7-9. Mr. Edwin Bell, The Cottage, Finisclin, Sligo.

SOMERSET (MID-).—Mrs. Clerk, Charlton, Shepton Mallet.

SOMERSET (SOUTH-).—Miss H. Trask, Courtfield, Norton, Stoke-under-Ham, Somerset.

STOCKSBRIDGE (S. YORKSHIRE).—June 18, 19. Mr. V. Challis, Viola Bank, Stocksbridge, near Sheffield. Adjudicator, Dr. Kighley.

STRATFORD (E. LONDON).—April 24, 26, 28, 29, 30, and May 1. Mr. J. Graham, 74, Park Hall Road, Finchley. A number of adjudicators.

WEST LINDSEY (GAINSBOROUGH).—April 28, 29. The Hon. Mrs. Sandars, Gate Burton Hall, Gainsborough, and Mrs. Talbot Cliff, The Grove, Scawby, Brigg. Adjudicator, Dr. Bairstow.

WHARFEDALE (ILKLEY).—April 21–May 1. Mr. A. Akeroyd, Kirk Ella, Leeds Road, Harrogate. Adjudicator, Dr. Brewer.

WIRRAL AND EDDISBURY.—April 29 to May 1. Mrs. H. Mitchell, Salings Bank, Grosvenor Road, Chester. Adjudicator, Dr. R. R. Terry.

WANSBECK (MORPETH).—March 26–27. Miss P. Fullarton James, Stobhill, Morpeth.

WORCESTERSHIRE.—May 18. Mr. A. B. Banks, Okehill, Kidderminster. Adjudicator, Dr. R. R. Terry.

YORKSHIRE.—April 24–27.—Mrs. Hemsworth, Monk Fryston Hall, South Milford, Yorks. Adjudicator, Dr. A. Somervell.

YORKSHIRE (SOUTH).—See STOCKSBRIDGE.

MANCHESTER—January 1.

The eleventh annual Eisteddfod organized by the Booth Street Welsh Congregational Church, proved so successful that although a larger hall had been engaged this year, it failed to accommodate all who sought admission. An enlarged programme also included three choral competitions, that for male-voice choirs proving to be the most interesting. Prothero's fine descriptive chorus 'The Crusaders' gave plenty of scope for expression, and that the contest between the four choirs was a keen one will be gathered from the appended marks:

		Marks.
	Middleton Apollo (Mr. Rothwell) ...	88
1st.	Tyldesley Welsh (Mr. Owen Davies) ...	97
	Levenshulme Apollo (Mr. Evans) ...	94
	Cambria Male-Voice, Manchester (Mr. Hughes)	95

In the mixed-voice class two choirs—King Street, Eccles, and (1st) Tyldesley United Choir (Mr. John Hughes)—sang 'The Lord is my Light' (Harold Smith), which, as the judge remarked, was scarcely exacting enough for a test-piece. Although the Tyldesley Choir developed a 'blatant' quality of tone he awarded them the Victory Cup. The only choir appearing in the female-voice class, the Ancoats Girls' Institute (Miss Ashworth) gave such a finished performance of Bantock's 'To the Evening Star' that they fully merited the Peace Cup awarded.

The fact that the competitors in the Ladies', Gentlemen's, and Juvenile solo contests were allowed their own choice of songs, lent variety to a lengthy programme. Miss C. Roberts (Manchester) secured premier honours.

Mr. J. E. Jones, who adjudicated, gave many useful hints to the competitors, and Mr. Llewellyn Tegid again proved a popular 'conductor' and judge of the recitals and literary subjects.

THE GLASGOW FESTIVAL.

In our last issue we were able to announce the date of this—the tenth—Glasgow Musical Competition Festival, which is to take place in St. Andrew's Halls from April 30 to May 8. We have now examined the syllabus, which contains matter of considerable interest, including adjudicators' impressions of the preceding Festival. Prof. Walford Davies makes the following suggestions:

'I venture to suggest that it may be possible to arrange some combined performances for future Festivals. It is a pity to let such choirs depart without having thrilled musical Glasgow with some glorious motet or cantata, singing shoulder to shoulder. It is perhaps difficult as yet to get an orchestra to accompany them, but there are great works that would crown the impression of the whole Festival with or without accompaniment. The great difficulty, that of finding time for everything, is a sign of health and embarrassing riches. But at the last half-hour of the last Saturday of the Festival, one imagines all competitors assembled singing (1) the folk-song of the year with the audience, (2) a specially-written hymn or solemn part-song, (3) at least one triumphant piece of great choral art, such as a Bach motet, for example, that should ring in everyone's memory for exactly a year. The foregoing is only suggested in the hope that Glasgow will soon evolve a Festival which in every aspect satisfies the needs of the music-student and music-lover. No Festival is complete without combined singing.'

The time has apparently not yet come for such a scheme to be carried out at Glasgow, but it is to be hoped that the committee has it in mind as a future development. The practical difficulties of introducing combined singing into a competitive programme are matters of experience. But there is much to be said for any scheme to promote the communal feeling among competing choirs.

The syllabus provides seventy-three classes, of which thirty-one are assigned to choral-singing in all its branches, eighteen to vocal solos, nine to duets, quartets, &c., seven to instrumental music, including chamber music, and eight to elocution, &c. We give below the test-pieces in the principal choral sections:

JUNIOR CHOIRS.

- 'Song of the Ermine' (César Franck).
- 'The nightingale' (Weelkes).
- 'The death of Trenar' (Brahms).
- (All three-part.)

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

- 'To the evening star' (Granville Bantock).
- 'Most gentle moon' (Julius Harrison).
- 'The forest fay' (Schumann).
- (All four-part.)

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

- 'O mariners, out of the sunlight' (Coleridge-Taylor).
- 'Down among the dead men' (arr. Granville Bantock).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

- 'O death, thou art the tranquil night' (eight-part) (Cornelius).
- 'Evening scene' (Elgar).
- The Hallelujah Chorus (Handel).

The adjudicators are Prof. Granville Bantock, Prof. H. Walford Davies, and Mr. Ernest Newman, and in the elocutionary and dramatic classes, Sir J. Forbes-Robertson.

THE LONDON MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVAL.

Under the above title the South and West London Musical Festival has taken a new form and a new dignity. The competitions are now to be held at the Central Hall, Westminster, a place easy of approach from all parts of London and a building that has always seemed well adapted to the requirements of competitions. The syllabus enumerates no fewer than eighty-four classes, and it need hardly be said that unusual comprehensiveness and variety go to make this number. In the 'Daily Telegraph Choral Championship' choirs of not more than fifty voices are invited to sing Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' and a piece of their own choice. For choirs of not more than forty voices the tests are Byrd's 'This sweet and merry month of May' and Charles Macpherson's arrangement of 'There's nae luck about the house' (with the provision that no notice will be taken of 'discrepancies' in Scottish pronunciation—a kindly thought). Ladies' choirs sing Colin Taylor's 'The desire' (three-part unaccompanied) and Malcolm Sargent's 'The song of the Bees'; and male choirs have Percy Fletcher's 'The Sailor's Return' and Granville Bantock's 'The Piper of Dundee.'

been sent in for the first competition under the Carnegie Trust, and was one of the six works selected out of a hundred and thirty submitted for publication. This early success led to his appointment as assistant to Dr. R. R. Terry on the committee appointed to deal with Tudor manuscripts.

It was also Dr. Terry who gave him his first performance in London, the work being a 'Missa Sine Nomine.' One week before the outbreak of war, Mr. Arthur L. Benjamin played the solo part in his Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra at a concert of the Patron's Fund. Though irrelevant to our subject, it is perhaps desirable to add that his indifferent health led to his being rejected for military service. It is during the war that he has become prominent as a composer, and the performance in rapid succession of a number of important works has firmly established his reputation. Two of these compositions were awarded prizes in the competitions organized by that untiring patron of chamber music, Mr. W. W. Cobbett.

The composer no longer attaches importance to the Concerto mentioned above, which dates from 1913. He regards it as unduly pompous. If only more composers could be induced to review some of their early work from the same angle of vision! To this year belongs the Comedy Suite for Clarinet and Pianoforte, a somewhat freakish work containing an attractive Serenade. The Suite is dedicated 'to a love-sick manikin,' who suggests a cousinship with Petroushka, though the likeness is of character rather than features. It brings to mind the mimetic action of the ballet. The music is humorous in an ingeniously quaint way that expresses itself for preference in the rhythm, though for that matter the gravest harmonies become humorous the way the composer uses them.

The Suite was performed in November, 1917. The Variations for Eleven Solo Instruments, composed in 1914, belong, strictly speaking, to the technical domain, their chief interest being derived from the devices employed to secure the best effect from the combination.

It is with the year 1915 that we enter upon the series of works which made the name of Herbert Howells familiar to music-lovers. The Three Dances for violin and orchestra (Op. 7), dedicated to George Whittaker, besides being an interesting addition to the rather sparse repertoire of short concert pieces in this form, contained many characteristic indications of what was to follow. Op. 10 consists of Five Songs for high voice with accompaniment for flute, clarinet, string quartet, and string orchestra, three of which are settings of typically English poems. It is in these that one may find the initial stage of that tendency towards an English idiom which has already been the subject of comment. This is not as yet very pronounced, nor does the composer himself regard it as anything but fortuitous, but for those who take an interest in the national aspect of our music, these songs may provide a starting point for a journey of discovery, the stations of which are Opp. 21, 23, 25, 15, 20, and 35. Viewed collectively, this group of works, and especially Opp. 21 and 35, may be taken as representative of that side of Herbert Howells's music which others, not he, claim to be a reflection of the English atmosphere.

The 'B's' is a perplexing title for an important orchestral composition, and music-lovers have some excuse if, on meeting with it for the first time, they conclude that it is an hommage to the great classics of music. The Suite for Orchestra (Op. 13) is, however, nothing of the kind. Its five movements are headed with the affectionate diminutives by which were known in their intimate circle five of the composer's friends and fellow students. These were 'Bublum,' 'Blissy,' 'Bartholomew,' 'Bunny,' and 'Benjy.' Four of them have served in the war, and 'Bunny,' otherwise Mr. Purcell Warren, made the great sacrifice. The 'Mons Elegy' (Op. 15) is inscribed to his memory. The Suite is somewhat light in character, and was performed at a Royal College Concert. In the course of last year it was repeated at Bournemouth under Mr. Dan Godfrey, and two movements of it were introduced as Symphonic Interludes into the repertoire of the Russian Ballet at the Alhambra Theatre. The following example:

is taken from the Scherzo which forms the second movement, and conveys a boisterous feeling which is very characteristic of the composer at this date.

'Lady Audrey's Suite,' pleasing as it is, may be dismissed briefly. Its four sections deal with anecdotal subjects suggested by an engaging little girl. It is genre painting of the daintiest description, disarmingly fresh and sprightly and indicating a personal sense of humour. The following example from the 'Sleepy Golliwogs' Dance':

caused the late Sir Hubert Parry to remark that he had heard the identical sounds produced in Morocco to the accompaniment of a hand drum, a recollection which afforded him much amusement.

The Pianoforte Quartet, Op. 21, which has been published by the Carnegie Trust, is one of Howell's finest works. Much has been written concerning it, and considering the important position it now occupies in the repertoire, it is interesting to recall that the first notes from which it was to grow were jotted down whilst the composer was kept waiting twenty minutes for a meal by an unpunctual landlady. This occurred on Saturday afternoon, February 12, 1916. The Quartet was begun a few weeks later in Gloucestershire, and completed in June. It was first played at the house of Miss Marion M. Scott on July 13, the players being Miss Nancy Phillips, Miss Sybil Maturin, Miss Dorothy Thuell, and Mr. George Ball, who afterwards played it at the College. Its first public performance took place at Oxford in November, 1917, and it was published in July, 1918. According to a description supplied to Miss Scott the poetic basis which inspired its three movements is a Gloucestershire hill and the country of the Cotswolds and the Severn that may be seen from it. 'When the first movement opens it is dawn, and the hill wind, pure, eternally free, and uplifting, is blowing: gradually the greyness changes to colour, the half-light to full radiance, mystery to vision, dawn into day.

The second movement is the Hill upon a day of midsummer, and the thoughts are those which come as a man lies on the grass on his back gazing upward into the vast vault of sky, seeing "the giant clouds go royally," watching the blue depths of height untold flow outward to surrounding immensity until, floating on the flood of wonder, mind and soul are almost loosed from their earthly anchorage.

'The Finale is the Hill in the month of March, with splendid winds of spring rioting over it, and flashing in the uxuberant rush, wild daffodils goldenly dancing.'

Despite the picturesque description, the Quartet is not programme music in the ordinary acceptance of the word, but neither is it abstract, and therefore these imaginative suggestions may prove of better service than a technical analysis such as has been supplied more than once. The themes are not authentic folk-songs, although possessing a close affinity with the folk-song idiom. The form of the three sections offers no difficulties, but there is a marked difference in their respective colourings. The first and third derive their effect from what might be described as a tapestry of tunes, whereas the slow movement, which is of haunting beauty, makes its impression more by its coloured surfaces. Yet its method is keeping with that of the work as a whole. These tapestry effects occur very frequently in Herbert Howells's work. Steeped as he is in the 16th century music of the Latin Church, he owes much to the polyphony of Palestrina, whose practice was to make his parts move correctly in regard to the bass, but with considerable license in regard to each other, whereas modern teaching, in so far as it enforces strictness, demands that all parts must be reconciled. A certain greyness pervades the whole work, but, as in the English landscape, it does not by any means stand in the way of a richness of texture such as can be observed in Ex. 3 on the opposite page.

To the same year belongs the original version of Howell's largest choral work, a setting of the old Scottish Ballad, 'Sir Patrick Spens,' planned for vocal quartet, string quartet and pianoforte, and afterwards scored for baritone solo, chorus and orchestra. The composer has followed the direct line of the poem, without repetitions or amplifications, and thus preserved the rapid action which is its most important feature. It is a rugged romance of the North Sea, full of dramatic incident, and rich in suggestions for tone-painting, of which he has availed himself without being tempted to excess. In many ways it is perhaps the most forceful work he has written, and it proves that although primarily a lyrist, he is quite alive to the fact that a robust subject is suitable material for lyrical treatment. This is often overlooked by those who yield to the fascination of purely meditative lyricism. If only for that reason it will be welcome to those who wish to see this strong personal talent expand over a wider field of music, but apart from that it deserves to rank among his best achievements.

I.—EARLY WORKS—(continued)

Two other pieces may be assigned to the Luneberg period—the preludes on 'Christ lag in Todesbanden'—'Christ lay in death's bonds'—(xviii., 19), and 'Embarm' dich mein'—'Have mercy upon me, O Lord'—(xviii., 35). The first was undoubtedly written for a two-manual harpsichord with pedals. If proof be wanted it will be found in the final bar:

Ex. 1.

The low E given to the right hand was necessary on the harpsichord because the pedal note would have faded away long before the closing chord was reached. This prelude begins and ends well, but is spoiled by a long passage in the middle, where a very tame progression of a bar's length is repeated about twenty times. The little piece on 'Embarm' dich mein' is much more worthy our attention. There is hardly any method of accompaniment more discredited—especially for organ use—than that of repeated chords. This seems to have been recognized very early in the history of organ music, and I can recall no other example of its use throughout a movement than a prelude on 'Vater unser' by Böhm and the Bach piece under notice. But even in these early days we find Bach improving on his model, and the result, primitive though it be, is curiously appealing. This is due to the highly expressive harmony, which contains some poignant touches. Spitta admits the 'great power of harmony and a deep sympathy with the feeling of the hymn,' though he finds the style faulty, and complains of 'certain harsh harmonies'—a complaint in which few of us will join. The piece is most effective when the melody is played in the tenor register. The accompanying chords need a very delicate stop if they are not to sound lumpy. They should be as little detached as possible, the result being a steady throb which adds much to the already considerable emotional appeal. Perhaps the suggested pace—crotchet = 50—is a trifle too slow.

Considerable impetus was given to Bach's work as organ composer by his appointment at the age of eighteen to the post of organist at Arnstadt. Here he had a newly-built two-manual instrument with the following specification:

Oberwerk (Upper manual)		Brust-positiv (Choir)

Coupler for the manual and pedals. Two bellows, 8 ft. by 4 ft.
No. 12, according to Dr. Eaglefield Hull ('Organ Playing,' p. 219), was a set of bells in tune.

Severe people who regard the tremulant as a fond thing vainly (and recently) invented, and unfit for use in the music of Bach and other old composers, will have a shock when they see it in the above list. We may be sure that Bach made use of it, too. Did he not, when drawing up the scheme for the restoration of the Weimar organ, stipulate that the pedal glockenspiel (a set of twenty-four bells) should be put in order? 'One who swallowed the camel of a carillon was not likely to strain at the gnat of a tremulant. Indeed, he was sufficiently appreciative of the device to be anxious for a good one. In this Weimar scheme we find him pointing out that 'the tremulant must be so put right that its action may be regular.'

It is futile to object to the use of any modern stops or accessories on the ground that 'Bach would not have used them.' Evidence on the point is scanty, but what we have shows Bach to have been not only an enthusiastic expert so far as the mechanical side of the organ was concerned, but also a player who made the most of the resources at his disposal. This point will be discussed in more detail when we come to consider the few works in which we have his own directions as to registration.

The first of the Arnstadt compositions to call for attention is the well-known Prelude and Fugue in C minor (ii., 48). The faults of the work are obvious, but it is still sufficiently effective to deserve playing, even by those of us who have left the pupil stage far behind. It is just the kind of work we should expect from a youngster let loose on an organ for the first time. The ponderous pedal solo, followed by long notes over which four parts disport themselves, the weighty repeated chords at bars twenty and twenty-four, and the section of the fugue following the belated pedal entry, all show the composer revelling in abundance of sound. We may imagine the ancients of Arnstadt shaking their heads, and complaining that the new organist was a noisy young fellow. The fugue is lamentably weak. It is even amusing to see how Bach, having announced the subject, low in the keyboard, brings in the next four entries at the top, the whole structure rising high and dry (especially dry) with both hands well up in the treble stave. Note, too, that he is unable to get away from the tonic and dominant when making an entry. How far Bach had yet to go before mastering the fugue form is shown not only by these naive methods, but also by his inability to continue the polyphonic web when the subject is in the bass. On the first occasion he is content with two-part writing of a rather fidgety quality; the second time he essays three-parts, with only moderate success, the first bar giving us a weak treble of repeated notes, with an Alberti tenor for stuffing:

The third entry is in the pedal, and here, with both hands at liberty, he makes no attempt at counterpoint, but boldly lets himself go with big chords, some of them of the 'chopstick' variety, rounding the work off with a capital bit of bravura writing. There was probably a technical reason for his primitive treatment of the theme when in the pedals. As we have seen, Bach had so far had but little opportunity for organ practice, and was naturally far more proficient on the manuals than on the pedals. He had reached the stage when a fairly showy pedal solo had no terrors, whereas a quick pedal theme, accompanied by two or three independent counterpoints, was beyond him. We find him writing no really difficult passages of this type until near the end of his stay at Arnstadt, when we may assume the fugue alla giga and the four-movement Toccata and Fugue in C (or E) to have been composed.

With all its imperfections, this C minor work shows Bach already drawing away from his older rivals in several important respects. The pedal solo has far more significance than such things were wont to possess, and the prelude as a whole, thanks chiefly to the use of the opening figure of the solo, has none of the rambling diffuseness that we find too often in Buxtehude, and occasionally in Bach himself during his first period. The cadenza at the end of the fugue is also a marked improvement on contemporary passages of the kind. But the greatest advance is to be found in the subject, one of the most delightful Bach ever wrote—of the lyrical type, that is. It is hardly too much to say that hitherto composers had attached little importance to the thematic side of fugal writing. Almost any series of notes seemed good enough for a subject. Born melodist that he was, Bach from the first rarely wrote anything but good subjects. His weakest are far ahead of such wretched scraps as these of Buxtehude, chosen almost at random:

Before leaving this work, a word may be said as to the registration of the closing passage. Most editions suggest a diminuendo, with diapasons only for the last chord. This method gives an impression of calm after storm, and there is something to be said for it. But a far finer effect, in my opinion, is obtained by playing the cadenza in the last four bars on the full organ without the Great reeds, bringing these on at the final chord. Let the building-up of this chord be deliberate, regardless of discords. There is a splendid note of triumph in the ending, managed thus. Some editors bring the pedal in with the low G at the end of the last bar but four, instead of reserving it for the E natural:

This is a good plan, provided the whole bar is slowed up, and the F and G played very deliberately. It may be added that the Augener and Schirmer editions give the semiquaver passage in the left hand of bar 2, page 49, to the pedal, thus:

I have dwelt on this work at far greater length than it deserves, judged on its actual merits. But it has seemed worth while, because the music throws a very interesting light on Bach's development. Moreover, of all his very early works, this is almost the only one worth playing to-day. It well deserves its popularity with students who are just 'finding their feet'—as Bach was when he wrote it.

Much less satisfactory is the other fugue in C minor written at this period (xii., 95). Its long subject opens in an arresting manner:

and the work contains a good deal of very spirited writing and not a few delightful harmonic touches. But the contrapuntal interest is small, and the general effect thin. Note, too, the lack of resource shown in dealing with the crotchet rests in the subject. Bach hits on a happy idea at the start, filling them in with a figure which seems like an answer to the abrupt ejaculation of the subject. But he seems unable to get away from it, and the bright repartee that begins by pleasing ends by irritating, as would any other repartee after so much repetition. The use of the pedal is very weak. It enters for the twelve final bars, and even then has nothing relevant to say, though the general effect of the Coda is good. On the whole, however, we shall not miss much if we leave this fugue on the shelf.

Only two pieces on Chorals appear to have been written at Arnstadt, a lengthy prelude on 'Wie schon leuchtet der Morgenstern,' 'How brightly shines the morning star' (xix., 23), and a short one on 'Wer nur den lieben Gott lasst walten,' 'If thou but suffer God to guide thee' (xix., 22). The first is fluently written on the whole, but says nothing of any importance. It breaks down badly half-way, giving us a good deal of weak broken arpeggio in place of the satisfying counterpoint with which it began. This is partly due to the weakness of the fifth phrase of the melody when used as a bass. Even Bach in his mature days could have done little with such a bass as this:

But the mature Bach would have been too wise to try. He would have made an inner part of it, and then done wonders round it. The other prelude survives in two versions, and is of little importance musically. The longer of the two is of interest on personal grounds because, according to Spitta, it appears to be a specimen of the kind of thing that led the authorities to charge Bach 'with having been in the habit of making surprising variations in the chorales, and inter-mixing divers strange sounds, so that thereby the congregation were confounded. If, in the future,' they added sternly, 'he wishes to add some tonus Peregrinus, he must keep to it, and not go off directly to something else, or, as he had hitherto done, play quite a tonum contrarium.' Only the short form of this piece appears in the Novello edition (xix., 22). The longer will be found in Peters (V., vi.), and in Augener (x., 1308). Young Bach evidently took reproof badly, for a further complaint says, 'The organist, Bach, used to play too long preludes, but after this was notified to him by the Herr Superintendent, he went at once to the opposite extreme, and has made them too short'—a little touch that makes us organists feel that John Sebastian was indeed one of us. He even had the traditional organists' impatience of the pulpit, though he ought not to have shown it by 'having gone to a wine-shop last Sunday during the sermon.'

But the chief ground of complaint was on the score of neglect of duty. Bach had obtained four weeks' leave of absence in order to visit Lubeck, whither he was drawn by the fame of Buxtehude. It is a pleasant picture, this of the young genius, with a year's savings in his pocket, setting off to walk fifty miles to sit at the feet of one who to-day shines only by the light thrown on him from his disciple. Unfortunately Lubeck proved so interesting that by the time Bach reported himself at Arnstadt the four weeks had run into four months, and when asked to account for the discrepancy he could only reply—rather lamely—that he had hoped his deputy would prove satisfactory.

This Lubeck pilgrimage was a notable event in Bach's life. It led to strained relations with the authorities, and so probably hastened his departure. Far more important, however is the fact that it provided a powerful stimulus to organ composition, and exerted a marked influence on his style for many years—not entirely for good, as we shall see.

HOPKIN EVANS

BY 'FESTE'

As is generally known, the post of conductor of the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union, held from 1902-14 by the late Harry Evans, has been filled by the appointment of Mr. Hopkin Evans. As this is one of the most important choral conductorships in the country, and as Mr. Evans has already done much notable work in Wales, I recently took an opportunity of interviewing him on behalf of the Musical Times.

'To begin at the beginning,' I said, 'you were born at . . . ?'

'At Resolven,' he replied, 'a village in the picturesque Vale of Neath, Glamorgan.'

'You come of a musical family?'

'Yes. My father was a good amateur musician and poet, with a strong religious bent.'

'Your first musical activities?'

'Nothing much in the prodigy line. I began, at the age of ten, by playing the flute and piccolo in the local band, and did not commence to study seriously until I was seventeen years old. What really decided my career for me was a stay of a few years in London just after I was out of my 'teens. There I rubbed shoulders with all sorts of musicians and heard all sorts of music, and went back to Wales full of enthusiasm and ambition.'

'What was your first step in the way of choral work?'

'The formation of a Society at Resolven immediately on my return from London, when we gave a series of concerts with orchestra—a thing hitherto unknown in the district,' he answered. 'The carrying off of some first prizes at the National Eisteddfod in 1905-6-7 no doubt led the Neath Choral Society to invite me to be their conductor. There, with excellent resources to draw on, I spent twelve happy and busy years.'

'What type of work did you perform at Neath?'

'The stock masterpieces, with a pretty good proportion of modern examples,' he replied. 'Here is a prospectus of the Society, giving a résumé of our activities, from which you will see that we sang, among other works, "St. Paul," "Elijah," "Hymn of Praise," "Golden Legend," "Song of Destiny," "Israel in Egypt," "Messiah," Jenkins's "Storm," "Dream of Gerontius" (twice), Parry's "War and Peace" and "Blest Pair of Sirens," Bantock's "Omar Khayyam," Elgar's "For the Fallen," "To Women," and "King Olaf," Mozart's "Requiem," "The Creation," Coleridge-Taylor's "A Tale of Old Japan," Borodin's Dances from "Prince Igor," Cowen's "The Veil," besides detached choruses, part-songs, madrigals, and other small works too numerous to mention. We had first-rate soloists, and on several occasions the Queen's Hall Orchestra and the Bands of the 1st Life Guards and Welsh Guards have been engaged.'

'What of the orchestral side of the programmes? Was it on the same level?'

'There was rather less of it, of course,' he replied; 'but there was nothing to be ashamed of in a list that included, as you see, the Overtures to "Egmont," "Leonora" (No. 3), "Rienzi," "Oberon," the "Meistersingers," the Prelude to "Tristan," Tchaikovsky's fifth and sixth Symphonies, Schubert's "Unfinished," German's "Welsh Rhapsody," Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, and the "Casse Noisette" Suite.'

'Here is the programme of our next concert, in April, which may also be the last under my baton':

CHORAL

'Blest Pair of Sirens'	Parry
'On Himalay'	Bantock
'News from Whydah'	Gardiner
'Crowns of Golden Light'	Hopkin Evans
'Sing ye to the Lord' (Double Motet) ...	Bach

ORCHESTRAL

Overture—"Tannhäuser"	Wagner
'L'Après-midi d'un faune'	Debussy
Solemn Melody	Walford Davies
Preludium	Jarnefelt
'Brythonic Overture' (by request) ...	Hopkin Evans

Soloist: Mr. Tom Burke.

The Welsh National Orchestra.

'You conducted some Welsh Choral Union concerts during the war, did you not?'

'Yes; I was one of the "guest-conductors" while the depleted choir "marked time." We are at full strength again now, though we are giving only three concerts during the present season. In 1920-21 we shall go back to the pre-war number. Our arrangements for the next four concerts are made. We hope to give Berlioz's "Faust," "Messiah"—our Christmas annual—"Gerontius," and a programme of short miscellaneous works. The material is splendid, and I have great hopes of our reaching the standard attained under my famous predecessor. He made the choir one of the finest in the country, and we are "all out" to get over the set-back caused by the war, and put the Union back in its old position.'

We talked of the forthcoming South Wales Festival, the result of a movement begun in 1912, when Mr. Evans and a few more enthusiasts organized a festival lasting a week. It was literally a movable feast, concerts being given at Swansea, Neath, Mountain Ash, and Newport, the Queen's Hall Orchestra accompanying the choral works prepared by the local societies. A similar festival was held in 1914 with great success.

'The prospects of a revival this season are most encouraging,' said Mr. Evans. 'Tremendous local enthusiasm is already being shown. A new feature, and one of the utmost importance, will be the appearance of a Welsh National Orchestra. We are making a big effort to remove the reproach so often levelled at our country in this respect. We hope the day is at hand when concert promoters in Wales will be able to engage a first-rate orchestra without sending outside the border. We have been, and always shall be, delighted to see our English friends from Queen's Hall and elsewhere, but the prime need of Wales just now is the encouragement of instrumental players of all kinds, and this end Council of Music of Wales, presided over by Dr. Walford Davies, is sure to bring about an all-round improvement.

'One of the drawbacks of the past,' said Mr. Evans, has been the lack of method and co-ordination. Schools, societies, and institutions of various kinds have been doing a lot of good work, but the fact that each one has been jogging along in its own way, regardless of the others, has been a great obstacle to progress in music as in other branches of art and education in Wales. There has been much waste of good material, energy, time, and can be attained quickly by no other means than the formation of orchestras of our own. We have an excellent committee, with a keen president in Lord Howard de Walden.'

Mr. Evans takes a hopeful view of the musical situation in Wales. But, fervent patriot though he is, he is opposed to anything like Chauvinism. His motto is not so much 'Wales for the Welsh' as 'The best for Wales.' In addition to the South Wales Festival other important schemes are afoot which are likely materially to affect the general situation. Then, again, the National money through the want of a common directing force, and if the National Council does no more than help systematise and focus the many musical activities it will have done a real service to the country and to British art.

'But even as it is we have made wonderful strides, if I may say so. I question whether any part of the Empire has advanced, relatively, as much as Wales has during the last quarter of a century. And this improvement has been effected not so much by the Eisteddfod as by the establishment of Musical Societies and by individual efforts in different parts of the country. Critics from across the border are apt to judge our musical status by what they see and hear at Eisteddfodau only.

‘Nothing could be more erroneous. An English writer, for example, in a recent article on “Music in Wales,” informed us that he had attended many Eisteddfodau and therefore claimed to speak with authority on the musical situation there! He came to the conclusion that we were still, so to speak, in a somewhat uncivilized state musically, and that modern music was as foreign to us as to the inhabitants of the Fiji Islands! The personal allusions contained in the article referred to, we could well afford to ignore, but the inaccurate views, hastily expressed, and the nonsense about modern music were resented by all musical South Walians. That is not the way to help things along: better far encourage those numerous societies, both large and small, that are striving—and with much success—to give performances not only of the works of the old masters, but of the most modern productions as well.

‘And critics who make merry over our frequent performances of the standard works such as “Messiah,” must bear in mind that but for these we should be able to do little for modern music. The cost of producing a big modern choral work is very heavy, and when, as frequently happens with new productions, the receipts do not meet the expenses, we naturally have to fall back on the old favourite to save the situation.’

‘In a word, what you lose on the swings of Whatshisname you gain on the roundabouts of Handel?’

‘Exactly. It used to be said, with a good deal of truth, that Handel and Mendelssohn were the worst enemies of the modern choral composer. But really they are his best friends: in a sense they subsidise him.’

Mr. Evans has played a prominent part in the National Eisteddfod, being appointed conductor of the Eisteddfod Choir and Orchestra at Birkenhead in 1917. He conducted the Psalmody Festival also (under the Presidency of Mr. Lloyd George) and had the rare honour of being selected to fill the same posts again in the following year. He is one of the judges for the Barry Eisteddfod in 1920.

‘Hard things have been said about some of the tests at these gatherings,’ he remarked. ‘Sometimes the strictures have been only too well deserved. But a glance at the Barry syllabus will show how much we are on the up-grade. I need only mention the fact that the test for the chief choral competition is Stanford’s “Revenge,” with the London Symphony Orchestra accompanying. In fact, there are forces at work in Wales of which little is known across the border. But the results will soon be apparent, and those of us best able to judge are confident that before many years are past our country will take a prominent place in European music. The natural genius of the Welsh for poetry and music has always been admitted, even by our severest critics. Now that we are shedding our parochial views, and are beginning to organize and educate, we may look with confidence to that genius soon becoming fully productive.’

If Wales has a few more enthusiasts of the Evans type, that confidence is well-founded. Thoroughly equipped, broad in outlook, catholic in taste, and abounding in vitality and enthusiasm Mr. Hopkin Evans may be expected to play a big part in the near future of British music.

NEW LIGHT ON EARLY TUDOR COMPOSERS

By W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD

V.—HUGH ASTON.

IT is no small compliment to the cult of early Tudor music to find a brilliant professor of the University of Brussels, M. Charles van den Borren, devoting much attention to the ‘Sources of Keyboard Music in England,’ and publishing the result of his researches in book form, of which an excellent English translation has been made by Mr. James E. Matthew.* In the opinion of M. Van den Borren, Hugh Aston is one of the most considerable figures in the development of virginal music of the early years of the 16th century, ‘whose importance has not been sufficiently insisted upon by historians of music.’ He devotes many pages to an analysis of Aston’s compositions, but in regard to his biography, is content with the bald statement that he was ‘an organist and composer of sacred music of the time of Henry VIII. (1509-47).’

Probably the best account hitherto accessible of Hugh Aston is that which is given in the new edition of Grove’s ‘Dictionary of Music and Musicians,’ from the pen of Mr. Godfrey E. P. Arkwright. Yet the biographical data—apart from the list of compositions—can only be described as disappointing. Here it is: ‘One of the leading English pre-Reformation composers (fl. 1500-20); his identity with an ecclesiastic of this name (for whom see the “Dictionary of National Biography”) cannot be proved.’ Dr. Ernest Walker, in his ‘History of Music in England’ (1907), says that Mr. Henry Davey’s identification of Aston with an Archdeacon of York, who died in 1522, ‘is purely conjectural’; while Mr. Percy A. Scholes is content with the statement: ‘Nothing is known of his life.’

The difficulty over the biography of Hugh Aston is heightened by reason of the name being spelled variously as Aston, Ashton, and Assheton, and still more from the fact that two ecclesiastics of the same name were contemporaneous. Mr. Henry Davey (in his useful ‘History of English Music’) was led astray by the similarity of names, and fell into a pardonable error in assuming that Hugh Aston, Archdeacon of York, was the same man as the composer. Had he investigated the State Papers, or the Wills, he would have found that the Archdeacon of York could not have been the same individual as the Hugh Aston of musical fame, for the former was alive in January, 1523, whereas the latter was then some months dead.

Hugh Aston was born about the year 1480, and graduated M.A. at Oxford on October 13, 1505. He is said to have been a Lancashire man, and this is not unlikely. At all events he was very musical, and on May 28, 1509, was given preferment as Canon and prebendary of St. Stephen's, Westminster, in the room of Richard Hatton, deceased, almost the same time that William Newark was confirmed as Master of the Children of the Chapel Royal (June 4, 1509). Seven years later, on May 31, 1515, a certain Hugh Aston was appointed Prebendary of York; but this is not our Hugh Aston.

Although Hugh Aston was not a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal (as has been supposed), yet as Canon of St. Stephen's he took part in all the great Court ceremonials. It is worthy of note that on March 8, 1522, the celebrated Thomas Linacre was given a prebend in St. Stephen's, Westminster; and it is also well to bear in mind that Richard Campson—the well-known composer—was Dean of St. Stephen's, as well as Dean of the Chapel Royal.

No further details can be gleaned from official records as to the composer Aston, until we reach the year 1522, when, on November 23, is chronicled the death of Hugh Aston, Canon of St. Stephen's, Westminster. This ecclesiastic is the celebrated musician whose biography has hitherto been so elusive. His will was proved in December, 1522, a fact which at once destroys his identity with Hugh Aston, of York, because we know that the latter was certainly alive in December, 1522, and even in January, 1523, and had been Prebendary of York from May 31, 1515, to January, 1523. From the 'Calendar of Letters and Papers of Henry VIII,' we learn that on January 10, 1523, Roger Drew, clerk, was presented to the prebend in St. Stephen's, Westminster, vacant by the death of Hugh Aston.

Among the MSS. in the British Museum (Royal Appendix, 58, ff. 40-9) dating from the first quarter of the 16th century are compositions for the virginal or spinet, written on two staves of from five to seven lines, including a 'Hornpipe, by Hugh Aston.' The ascription of 'Hugh Aston's ground' to our composer is probably to be regarded in the light of an arrangement, because the same theme has been created by Byrd and by Francis Tregian. In the library of Christ Church, Oxford, there is a composition by William Whytbrook entitled 'Hugh Aston's Maske,' in four parts, wanting the bass, evidently an elaboration of Aston's theme, whether original or adapted.

It has been surmised that two other virginal compositions in the same Royal Appendix 58, namely, 'Lady Carey's Dumpe,' and 'the short measure of my Lady Wynkfyldes Round,' are by Hugh Aston, but both are anonymous, and the evidence for such an ascription is not convincing. Stafford Smith in his 'Musica Antiqua' (1812) ascribes 'My Lady Carey's Dumpe' to a certain Edmund Spencer. Anyhow, Aston's 'Hornpipe' is a very real contribution to the virginal music of the period 1500-20, showing a good conception of the variation form with a drone bass. In fact, this little virginal piece, as M. Van den Borren says, 'shows the art of variation arrived at a degree of development of which the Continent offers no example.'

As might be expected from a Churchman, Aston has left us many interesting specimens of his ability in the domain of ecclesiastical music. Two of his masses, one for six voices ('Videte manus meas') and another for five voices (Te Deum) are in the Oxford Music School Collection, while there is a fine Te Deum for five voices by him in the Bodleian Library. Many of his Motets are to be found at Cambridge—at Peterhouse, at University College, and at St. John's College. His 'Gaude Virgo' is also to be met with—but in an imperfect state—in the British Museum (Add. MSS. 34191).

However, it is as one of the earliest English composers for the virginal that Hugh Aston deserves to be in remembrance, although one cannot agree with the fulsome eulogy describing him as 'the inventor of instrumental composition in Europe.'

Occasional Notes

Sir Edward Elgar recently paid a visit to Amsterdam, conducting the famous Mengelberg Orchestra in a programme consisting of his first Symphony, the Violin Concerto, and the 'Cockaigne' Overture. In view of some French criticisms of the Symphony, it is of interest to read how an Elgar programme impressed the Dutch. De Telegraaf of November 21 contained a long article on the composer, from which we quote a few extracts:

'It was evident from the first bars of the Symphony onwards that we have hitherto considered the music of Elgar from an erroneous standpoint. We regarded his technique one-sidedly and dogmatically as an academical work of art. . . . He works less by formulas and formalism than we thought. Or, rather, his formalism is of a more vivacious and warm-blooded variety than was understood here. . . . The light which streams from his music is more atmospheric, the movement more energetic, more lofty, more lyrical and delicate, the accent broader and more sympathetic than we were aware. Nor should I rank Elgar so immediately after Brahms as is done here without obvious and compelling reason. Elgar has never the least tendency to a confusion of hybrid styles, and has no fundamental falsity. He does not blow the bourgeois trumpet of the commonplace, he avoids all facile pathos; he does not write in the style of Brahms.'

The critic then proceeds to argue that Elgar's music is cosmopolitan in style. He regrets that the concert under notice was devoted to the composer's orchestral music, and suggests that choral societies shall at once take steps to make the Dutch public familiar with 'Gerontius' and 'The Apostles.' He pays a glowing tribute to Elgar's mastery of technique, saying that he knows of 'no architect in tone who can compare with him in the design, systematically carried out, of the apotheosis of the religious leading theme of his first Symphony.'

He ends by saying 'the concert was an emphatic triumph for Elgar. I cannot remember any composer who has been rendered such homage by the orchestra.'

It has long been a grievance that although congregations are usually generous when called on to subscribe for a new organ, they have a severe fit of economy when faced with the much less exciting business of providing a decent salary for the man who plays it. Hence the frequency of advertisements of posts at which the stipend is miserably small, and the organ 'fine,' 'large,' 'four-manual,' and so forth, the assumption apparently being that the man who is underpaid—which in these days usually means underfed and badly clothed—will console himself with the beauty of the instrument at his disposal. If his butcher and baker would act on the same principle, and give him a receipted bill from time to time in token of the pleasure they have derived from his playing, there might be less cause for complaint. We are glad to see that in at least one Parish Church this anomaly is to be ended. According to the Ross Gazette, an anonymous donor has offered to present the Church with a new organ at a cost of £2,000, on condition that the congregation raise a sum of money sufficient to guarantee that the organist shall be paid not less than £125 per annum for a period of at least ten years. The parishioners met at Christmas and wisely decided to accept the offer. They began to shoulder the financial burden on the spot, an appeal for guarantors for the fund for the next ten years meeting, we read, 'with a very generous response.' We recommend this example to the numerous parishes where arrangements are now being made for the erection of organs as war memorials.

'Feste' writes :

'A footnote to the "Interlude" on "Ruth." I had searched in vain for contemporary reference to the work, and had given up the quest, when I received from Mr. Percy Scholes (to whom be thanks) Vol. 2 of the Monthly Musical Record, in which appeared, under date June 1, 1872, an amusing review by Prout, the editor at that time. Prout adopts the mock serious style with great effect, using such ambiguous phrases as "that most remarkable movement . . . which contains some very striking passages, totally unlike anything to be met with in the whole range of music . . . a chorus of no common order . . . one of those pieces to which no verbal description can possibly do justice. It must be heard to be appreciated. . . ."

'A keen sense of humour could not belong to the composer of such a work as "Ruth," so we need not be surprised to find him writing to the editor, gravely discussing certain of the points in the review. How oblivious he was to Prout's irony is shown by his description of the notice as "the justest that has yet met my eye." Prout expressed his pleasure at this, adding slyly, "We certainly desired, as far as was in our power, to do him full justice." Are there any English performances of the work recorded? A fair number of copies must have been sold, for the review was concerned with the second edition. But there are various ways of obtaining a public, and "Ruth" was evidently a succès de ridicule.'

Mention of the Monthly Musical Record reminds us that congratulations are due to that journal on having reached its fiftieth year. The history of musical journalism is mainly a record of untimely deaths. Many an infant periodical, lusty at birth, has speedily succumbed to circulatory trouble: few have passed the stage of growing pains. Fifty years is ripe old age in such a world, but we need not be surprised to find it attained by a journal whose editors have been Ebenezer Prout, C. A. Barry, W. A. Barrett, and J. S. Shedlock, supported by a long and strong list of contributors, native and foreign.

A reader asks for information as to the publisher, price, and opus numbers of the following organ works, played by Mr. David Clegg at a recital at Kettering recently: Studies in Harmony and Counterpoint, Brahms; French Cathedral Organ Music, César Franck; Academical Organ Fugue, Brahms; Cathedral Organ Music, Sebastian Bach; Symphony Fantasia, Berlioz; Grand Symphony, Rubinstein. The two recitals at which these works were played happily sent no hearers to sleep, if we may judge from the report in a local paper:

'MARTIAL STRAINS'

'Special interest naturally centred in the player's own "Victory" Organ Symphony. Opening with clarion calls, presently joined by pedallings suggestive of the far-distant booming of cannon, and interspersed with trumpet-echoings most cleverly and convincingly contrived, this remarkable production soon created a martial atmosphere no less realistic than thrilling. . . . One, however, almost entirely lost sight of the fact that it was an organ, as, introducing the "Marsellaise," "Yankee Doodle," and "Rule, Britannia" in turn; then "plaiting" them together, as it were; and throwing in some wonderful imitations of bands a-playing, drums a-throbbing, and feet a-marching, marching, and still marching—Mr. Clegg built up his picturesque and stirring spectacle.

'STATELY MUSIC'

'Scarcely had the final roar of "Rule, Britannia" died away ere the performer's wizardry had swept his fascinated listeners away from the scene of military splendours and triumphs and—into the sanctuary! . . .'

'MEDLEY MUSIC'

'Next came about as varied a concoction as the most inveterate melody-taster could wish for, "Melody Gems." Confessedly, it came as a bit of a shock when "Irby," the universally favourite tune to "Once in Royal David's City," was promptly followed by "Roses of Picardy." Likewise introduced "en route" were such tunes as "From Greenland's icy mountains," "Dismissal," "Maidstone" (three more hymn-settings), "Dearest heart of mine," the Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffmann," and other popular tunes; this motley pageant finishing with "Onward, Christian Soldiers."

'Mr. Clegg gave a further demonstration of the organ's imitative capabilities by playing an American band contest piece, and brought his recital to a close with a satisfyingly sensational rendering of the Swiss Storm Piece.'

Even the depressing influence of Studies in Harmony and Counterpoint and Academical Fugues could make little headway in so merry and bright and satisfyingly sensational a scheme as this.

The following letter reached Messrs. Novello a few days ago:

May I trouble you to let me know if it is possible for me to get a gramophone with records of the Church chants and hymns which could be used in Church instead of a choir? Have you got them?

We do not know how far gramophone makers are prepared to meet a demand of this kind. No doubt the time is rapidly approaching when the human agent will be a very small factor in musical performances. Be that as it may, we have here a hint as to the quickest and easiest way of solving the choir problem. No more books to buy or bind; no more boys to fine or suspend; no more choirmen to soothe and cajole; no more cassocks to re-button or surplices to wash; no more choir suppers or excursions; no more chronically insolvent choir funds. The vicar sits quietly in his study and orders a set of records week by week, choosing his favourite tunes as often as he likes. There will be no organist to interfere, for that troublesome person will have followed the choir. No one doubts that the methods of the mechanical pianoforte will soon be applied with equal success to the organ. In a few years' time the faithful will be played in and out of church by the organola, and will lift up their voices to an accompaniment provided by the same useful article. The gramophone, if used at all, will be a mere stopgap. The only choral record the writer has so far heard held out little promise of the instrument ever being a satisfactory substitute for a choir. It was a record of a hymn sung by a Cathedral quartet. No doubt it was impressive at first hand, but what reached the ear, after that brief asthmatic prelude without which no gramophone performance is complete, was a medley of four tired and tinny voices. As an amusing interlude for a not too critical drawing-room it had its points, but for leading a congregation it left a good deal to be desired. This was some years ago, and we are willing to believe that the instrument is much improved.

But the reverend gentleman who wrote the above letter must not overlook other possibilities. Many organists cannot play and many choirs cannot sing, but it cannot be denied that the percentage of clergy who cannot preach is almost as large. The reading of the lessons also leaves a good deal to be desired as a rule. If we are to make a fetish of efficiency, and supersede our imperfect but well-meaning and often hard-working choirs and organists by mechanical devices, why not do the thing thoroughly, and plant a gramophone in the pulpit and at the lectern? Records of sermons by our popular preachers, and lessons read by fine elocutionists, would be a great attraction. Some of our congregations would realise for the first time that the Song of Deborah, for example, is one of the finest pieces of poetry in the language, calling for something better than a casual delivery inaudible ten pews away. And the Gloomy Dean would exhort thousands instead of the mere hundreds he is able to reach at first hand. There is respectable precedent for this. The reader will remember that when the Spectator spent a Sunday with Sir Roger de Coverley, he attended the village church and was edified by eloquent discourses from 'the Bishop of St. Asaph in the morning, and Dr. South in the afternoon.' Those eminent divines were dead or far away, but Sir Roger's chaplain, having no gift of preaching and being aware of the fact (or Sir Roger being aware of it, which was the same thing), read sermons from their published collections.

It will probably be a long time before we listen to sermons per gramophone, but the organola is well on the way. The Vicarage gardener, who has long been one of the pillars of church music, will no doubt take charge of it, reliability rather than art being the chief requirement in an organolist. Failing a dependable hand, we may hear of contretemps of the type that lingers in the local history of most country parishes—of the barrel organ starting on some worldly tune in the middle of the service, refusing to stop, and being carried off to finish its scandalous performance in the churchyard. And adventures are possible even when the right tune is present. The writer remembers hearing an organette (one of the earliest types of mechanical instrument in which a perforated roll was used) playing a movement that was new and strange, and which yet had some oddly familiar moments. It turned out to be the Hallelujah Chorus, played backwards.

Mr. E. T. Clark, 98, Glynn Court, Detroit, Michigan, asks us to make known the fact that he is offering a prize of twenty-five dollars for an original Round for three or four voices. Knowing the British partiality for Rounds, he has postponed the date of entry until February 28, in order to give our composers a chance of competing. The words are to be selected by competitors. The name of the composer should not appear on the manuscript, but should accompany it in a letter. Competitors may submit more than one Round. The judging will be done by the competitors themselves, each receiving copies of the works of his rivals, with a request to place them in order of merit. The composition receiving the highest number of votes will be awarded the prize. MSS. should be sent to Mr. Clark.

Something of a sensation was caused in Paris by the recent visit of the 'Chœur National Ukrainien' of eighty mixed voices. Their singing seems to have been remarkable for its combination of wonderful execution and passionate expression. A correspondent who attended one of their concerts in Paris sends us the following impression:

We all felt that the singing of these gifted amateurs would be a revelation to London audiences, for I never heard any singing to equal their performances, nor indeed, to come near them. We listened with intense interest all the evening to their unaccompanied performances, the voices (bouche fermée) of some often forming a wonderful accompaniment to the impassioned singing of others, with charming orchestral effects, and the occasional entry of women's voices alone was beautiful beyond description. The conductor is an enthusiastic and cultured musician, and I gladly promised them to do my utmost to induce some of our leading musicians to put a little pressure on the Government to allow them passports to England.

We are glad to hear that arrangements are being made for the choir to visit London.

We take the following from Punch of January 21:

Mr. Vincent D'Indy's recently-published 'Course of Musical Composition' attracted a good deal of attention among French musicians, as was natural. One of the results was a brochure by Saint-Saëns, entitled 'Les Idées de M. Vincent D'Indy' (Paris: Lafitte). In this the veteran composer delivers himself trenchantly, not only on D'Indy's ideas but on things in general. In our next number we shall commence the publication of the booklet in an English version (by Mr. Fred Rothwell) which has been authorised by Saint-Saëns.

The British Music Society will hold a Congress in London from May 3 to 8. The arrangements will include four morning meetings at Æolian Hall, and four evening concerts at various halls, a banquet, on May 7, and a general meeting on the morning of May 8.

Messrs. Chappell & Co. offer a prize of £200 for a 'Light Suite for orchestra.' The judges are Sir Henry Wood, Mr. Landon Ronald, and Mr. Alick Maclean.

We are now able to announce that the concerts to be given in London next summer by the New York Symphony Society will take place on June 14, 15, 16 (evenings), 17 and 18 (afternoons).

'MUSICAL TIMES' COMPETITIONS

In answer to 'Gamba' and others: Competitors may send in more than one work. Unsuccessful works will be returned to the senders in due course.

BRITISH MUSIC IN AMERICA

BY NORMAN PETERKIN

A programme of works by Holbrooke, Scott, Goossens, Vaughan Williams, Ireland, and other British composers given in Paris, reminds us that the music of our younger men is slowly making its way, and that its qualities are being recognised in countries other than our own.

So far as France is concerned, a great deal of the credit is due to Mr. Edwin Evans and M. Jean-Aubry for their efforts on behalf of our composers.

Mr. Evans's enthusiasm for the music of the French, Russian, and other modern schools has not blinded him to the worth of our own younger men, and he has been quick to encourage and draw attention to anything worthy, and to make propaganda for it in and out of England. M. Jean-Aubry, too, has long been interested in our composers, and has been generous in his efforts on their behalf. He has done excellent work, for which he is to be thanked.

Other countries that have welcomed our music, and if the truth be known have been amazed at the quality of it, are Spain and Scandinavia, credit in this case being due to the pioneer work of the London String Quartet and Mr. William Murdoch the pianist. Quite recently the Daily Telegraph received a report of a concert in Spain in which some of the work of Cyril Scott was produced, the critics apparently receiving it with the greatest favour. The notice wound up by saying, 'We hope to have more opportunities for becoming acquainted with the works of this eminent figure of the British School, that British School so badly known, and consequently so badly judged in this country.'

The last sentence very accurately reveals the weak spot. It is exactly because there is such scant knowledge of our music abroad that the legend of its inferiority has so long persisted.

The French Government long ago discerned the value of musical propaganda, and has encouraged and supported French music, and officially sent French musicians to other countries to spread it.

A field that we have rather overlooked is the United States, although our Government has sent agents there to make various propaganda. It has even sent eminent literary men, but no musicians. On the other hand, the French have tended to overdo matters in this direction, the Government sending a stream of musicians, including a prominent orchestra with Cortôt as soloist, solely to make propaganda for French music and art. It became almost a standing joke with the United States papers that almost every French musician that appeared was there under official auspices.

That we have been too slack in this way is a pity, for the States have been very receptive of our music. Not only have they welcomed it and asked for a wider acquaintance, but they even have some of our best younger composers working in their midst. Whether these writers have shaken the dust of England off their feet in disgust I do not know. The fact remains that men like Percy Grainger, Arthur Hinton, Bryceson Treharne, and Cecil Forsyth have gone over to the States and in some cases are apparently settling down there.

Holbrooke also paid them a visit. He appears to have found his experiences unfortunate; but I think he is the exception, for the others have all met with appreciation and artistic success. At different times I have seen discriminating and appreciative articles and studies in American papers on the work of Goossens, Scott, Ireland, Frank Bridge, Ernest Austin, and others, and they have a very genuine interest in the work of our young men. Our older writers have not fared so well. Elgar is not generally liked or rated highly, while one critic writes of Bantock's songs: 'The wonder is that a man who has dived so deeply into folk-song can write such rubbish.' On the other hand, Stanford's Pianoforte Concerto and other works were performed over there long before being heard in England.

Percy Grainger has had enormous success both as pianist and composer. To the British public he is chiefly known as the writer of such popular works as 'Molly on the shore,' 'Mock Morris,' and similar things. True it is that a narrow circle is aware that his powers go much deeper than this. Cyril Scott has written enthusiastically of Grainger, and regards him as one of the greatest living composers. Delius, I believe, holds a similar view.

Their opinion is supported by some of the reviews of the works that Grainger has produced in America. Of his symphonic poem 'The Warriors'—a score on which he was engaged five years—one prominent New York critic writes: 'At a bound the composer of "Molly on the shore," "Handel in the Strand," and other catchy rhythms and spicy oddities, has revealed himself as a serious and ultra-modern composer of an astounding originality, and of an erudition worthy of Richard Strauss.'

In the opinion of another critic, "The Warriors," a symphonic poem, makes Stravinsky sound like Mozart.'

A third writes: 'If the work embodies his ultimate artistic aims, even his stoutest-hearted admirers may quail before he carries out to what may be the final issue, his revelling in the mere sound and volume of strange and unusual instruments, his fondness for inventing and sorting out and strangely combining timbres, old and new, for the piling up of sonorities, for grinding together immeasurable harmonies and tones and rhythms in a sort of ruthless counterpoint.

All of which is intensely interesting and makes one wonder when we in England are to hear 'The Warriors' and other large works which apparently reveal him in such an entirely new light. Grainger has also published in New York, through Schirmer, Fischer Bros., and other houses, more pieces of the type we are familiar with over here. Among them are 'Knight and Shepherd's daughter,' 'Country Gardens,' and a Suite called 'In a Nutshell,' for pianoforte, orchestra, and special percussion instruments. This comprises the movements 'Arrival Platform Humlet,' 'Gay but wistful' (termed an attempt to write an air with a 'music-hall' flavour), 'Pastorale,' and 'Gum-suckers' March.' How typical of the Grainger we know this all sounds!

Arthur Hinton is another British composer who spent some time in the States, and some of whose most important work is published there. His orchestral 'Scenes from Endymion' were performed by the New York Philharmonic and other important orchestras with highly favourable critical comment. Better still, the score of this work, together with some of his most important chamber music and pianoforte works, have been published by Fischer Bros. of New York. Of the latter a particularly fine set is called 'A Summer Pilgrimage,' the last number of which, 'Passing of Summer,' is one of the most notable bits of pianoforte music of recent years. Is any of this work known and performed here? It has met with the greatest appreciation in the States.

A case that is quite extraordinary is that of Bryceson Treharne, another Englishman, all of whose work has been published in America, and who has gained a very high reputation whilst remaining comparatively unknown in England. He has been praised superlatively and hailed by the best American critics as worthy of international recognition, and as being one of the most significant figures of our younger British School. Though one may not go all the way with the American critics in their estimate of his work (for he has written copiously and does not sustain the level, often descending to the obvious and commonplace), yet there is no doubt that his finest work, chiefly songs, definitely places him alongside Scott, Ireland, Vaughan Williams, and the best of our writers.

Treharne is of Welsh extraction, and, to quote one critic, 'it is not surprising to find the latest British musical genius hailing from that tuneful race.'

Another writes: 'His songs stand out collectively far ahead of all other English songs composed since the days that saw the glory of old English music wane'—an extraordinary tribute when one thinks of what writers like Bantock, Scott, Parry, Vaughan Williams, and Holbrooke have accomplished in this direction, and a tribute that I find difficult wholeheartedly to subscribe to, though I am a great admirer of his best work.

The well-known New York critic, Mr. Walter Kramer, himself a writer of distinction, says: 'These nine songs, his first published in America, defy criticism in the ordinary way. They are every one of them of the first rank, art-songs so beautifully done, so thoroughly spontaneous and individual, as to brand their composer a man of extraordinary gifts.'

It would be an easy matter to quote many more critiques of a similar kind from responsible American authorities.

Still another British composer now working in the States is Cecil Forsyth. Well enough known here for a very valuable work on orchestration, he is hardly widely known as a composer. Many years ago he produced a Viola Concerto and some Orchestral Variations in London. Forsyth since those days, however, has apparently made big strides as a composer, for a recently-published set of songs is altogether more mature and harmonically distinguished, and show that he is now writing exceptionally interesting songs that deserve placing with our best.

I have said enough to show that America has taken the keenest interest in the work of our younger composers, and that the field is well worth cultivating. In some cases she has discovered new British writers for us, and given them practical encouragement by performance and publication.

In return might we not take the trouble to acquaint ourselves with the work of her rapidly-growing band of younger composers? Too few of us have any knowledge of the work of John Alden Carpenter, Charles T. Griffes (a most interesting writer), Henry Hadley, Carl Engel, Wakefield Cadman, Rubin Goldmark, Walter Kramer, and others, all of them composers of individuality who are producing work that well bears comparison with what is being done here and in other countries.

London Concerts

BY ALFRED KALISCH

Though there was a lull at Christmas, there are as many concerts deserving record to-day as there are in normal months. Before the end of the year there were several noteworthy incidents. Foremost among them was the performance by the London String Quartet (with two other players) of Arnold Schönberg's Sextet for Strings on December 27. It was the first time, I believe, that a work of such importance by a living ex-enemy composer had been heard in a London concert hall since 1914. The result was surprising. The Sextet proved so popular as to bring an irresistible demand for its repetition on the following Saturday (January 3), when there was another overflowing audience, the reception of the work being again enthusiastic. Obviously the intervening years have not served to change public opinion of its merit.

This has not been the only, though it has perhaps been the most striking, symptom of the state of public feeling as to enemy music. The names of Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, and Weingartner have appeared in the programmes of vocal recitals, and the works of Brahms and Schumann have been less rare. Up till now the songs have been sung in English. The daring experiment of gauging the effect of the German language on an English audience has not yet been tried in London. But I see an announcement of a forthcoming performance of 'Death and Transfiguration' in February.

To continue discussion of chamber music, since it has been begun: The Edith Robinson Quartet, a very capable body of players from Lancashire, introduced to London (January 9) the Quartet in F sharp minor (Op. 121) of Max Reger. He is not a living composer, but as he died only recently this is the proper place for mention of his Quartet.

Max Reger is something of a problem. This work proves that he was capable of doing really new things in the way of developing the sonority of the quartet along legitimate lines; or, in other words, though unusually sonorous, the music does not sound like a symphonic score gone astray, or attempt to express things beyond the scope of the four instruments. Max Reger too had a great power of building up solid, well-proportioned structures out of the most unpromising material, for with the exception of one tune in the slow movement there is not a striking idea—quâ idea—in the work. The whole gives a suggestion of a certain bigness totally devoid of any kind of charm. This cannot be laid to the charge of the players, for there was no lack of that quality in their playing of this music. When Max Reger died unromantically of fatty degeneration, a German critic said that his later music showed traces of the disease, or words to that effect—a criticism singularly applicable to this particular work, though possibly not in the best taste. As, however, it was said by one of his own countrymen there can be no harm in reproducing it in England.

Only two orchestral novelties that call for notice have been heard since the last number appeared. One was 'Souvenir' by Vincent d'Indy, produced at the Queen's Hall Sunday concert on January 4. It is not a new work, but when one had heard it he understood why it had taken so long to cross the Channel. It is a curious mixture of styles from Weber to Strauss, with no unifying principle. That the imitations are adroit cannot, however, be denied.

The second new composition was M. Georges Dorlay's 'Flamma Artis,' produced by Mr. Albert Coates at the concert of the London Symphony Orchestra on January 19. M. Dorlay's work is an important novelty—if importance is measured by length and elaboration of workmanship; but it is to be feared that 'Flamma Artis' will not prove a work of real significance. The composer calls it a Lyrical Symphonic Poem—which means an orchestral piece with the accompaniment of a soprano. I say accompaniment advisedly, since even Miss Buckman's robust voice was worsted in the struggle with the orchestra. In any case the voice seems quite unnecessary, as it never has a vocal phrase and the words could never be intelligible—and had they been, the text, signed 'Zogheb,' is a real puzzle. Such pseudo-metaphysical hair-splitting (enlivened by mixed metaphors like 'a tinkling bell rankling in the void of our soul') is but an impediment to musical thought. The poetical basis of the poem—the struggles of the artist's soul—is a good subject for a symphonic poem, and in the other compositions of M. Dorlay that we know, he has shown himself capable of illustrating it. He has a distinct gift of picturesque scoring and a vein of not ineffective rhetoric, and he has studied his Strauss and his Scriabin to advantage. There is atmosphere in the opening tutti and the closing section, and some of the (too numerous) climaxes are skilfully devised; but the whole is overborne by the deadweight of the text. Without the voice, and much shortened, 'Flamma Artis' might hold the attention. It should be added that it is the third section of a trilogy.

At the same concert Mr. Albert Coates conducted an extremely virile and passionate yet well-balanced performance of Beethoven's C minor Symphony.

We had not heard Mr. Coates interpret the classics for a long time, and for this reason we had looked forward to this performance with special interest. As he now exercises a great influence on public taste, it is satisfactory to know that his devotion to the moderns is not inconsistent with an eminently sane view of their predecessors.

A few words must be given to the extremely poetical and sensitive performance of César Franck's 'Symphonic Variations' by Signor Alfredo Casella, the Italian composer, at the Sunday concert at Queen's Hall on the 18th of last month.

It was very pleasant to welcome back Mr. Clarence Whitehill at the Albert Hall (on Sunday, December 28). We have not heard Wotan's 'Farewell' sung with such noble breadth of style since Mr. Whitehill was here last. He sang also some Japanese songs by a Japanese composer, Yamada, of whom we shall doubtless hear more in the future. Mr. Whitehill's singing of Iago's Credo from Verdi's 'Otello' was masterly, and Mr. Coates roused the audience to a high pitch by his conducting of Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet.' The British Symphony Orchestra played extremely well. Leopold Godowsky was to have made his rentrée at this concert, but had not reached England, and his place was taken by Mark Hambourg.

Among the pianoforte recitals the most original were the three given by Mr. Edwin S. Mitchell, the assistant-organist of Westminster Cathedral, at the Central Hall, Westminster. They were organized by the Music Student and were labelled 'informal,' the informality consisting of permission to smoke, of which full advantage was taken. At the last of the three Mr. Percy Scholes invited the music critics present to step on to the platform and express their opinions of the Scriabin programme which Mr. Mitchell had just played, but though no doubt bold as lions with pens in their hands, they shrank from the ordeal.

A more important feature of the recitals, however, was the composition of the programmes, in which only very modern music was heard. It was a great feat on the part of Mr. Mitchell to memorise so much music which demands what may be called an entirely new technique of mnemonics. He played the music very ably and intellectually, yet while disposing of the legend that the 'organist's pianoforte touch' is fatal to variety and delicacy of tone, he did not quite convince us that tone-colour is his strongest point. The most striking of these recitals was the last, at which only Scriabin—and chiefly the later Scriabin—was played. It may be doubted whether a whole afternoon of Scriabin is the best way to make converts to his gospel. Personally I have derived more pleasure from individual pieces when they came in an ordinary programme as a contrast to their surroundings. His strongly flavoured harmonies, which sound less disconcerting when variety of orchestral colour softens them, end by creating a desire for simpler methods. At the same time no one could doubt Scriabin has enlarged the expressive powers of the pianoforte. The Sonatas proved the severest test of faith: it is not necessary to be a true believer to accept 'Vers la Flamme' without reservation. As that was one of his latest works, perhaps it may be taken to show that had he lived Scriabin might have retreated from some of his most advanced positions.

There has been no lack of choral singing—which is dealt with elsewhere—nor of vocal recitals. The first in point of time and also in interest has been that of M. Mischa-Léon at Æolian Hall on January 10. His imaginative interpretations held a large audience interested throughout a long programme containing music of many styles. A Scandinavian group was the least familiar, and included many charming songs which one would be glad to see more widely known. The best of them, while having an individual flavour and freshness, show strong traces of the influence of the Romantic School. It was pleasant again to hear two of the finest and best-known songs of Strauss.

Miss Megan Foster gave a highly promising final recital on the 15th of last month. Her freshness of feeling—and of voice—are very pleasant, and though at present the singing of songs in lighter vein is her strongest point, there are indications that in time her powers of interpretation will acquire a wider range. She was assisted by her father, Mr. Ivor Foster—an unusual happening on the concert platform, though heredity in music is common enough, as every school-boy knows.

The recitals of Miss Dora Gibson, Miss Dorothy Robson, and Mr. Walter Johnstone-Douglas were all interesting, and showed that the level of interpretative power among our singers is far higher than it used to be, while they are less prone to undervalue charm of tone than are artists from other countries. It had been over-estimated in this country at the expense of expression, but we are finding the right balance. All these singers are so well known that it is unnecessary to go into more detail; but Ireland's highly original 'The Rat,' sung by Mr. Johnstone-Douglas, should be mentioned, and Mr. G. Armstrong Gibbs's String Quartet is a work which makes one desirous of hearing more of his music. It would have attracted greater attention had it been played to an audience primarily interested in chamber music. Miss Robson—now that operatic work is no longer her principal sphere—is developing her talents as a singer of songs, and she was particularly sympathetic in Brahms and Schumann. The songs of John Alden Carpenter introduced by Miss Gibson deserve the attention of artists.

Opera in London

By FRANCIS E. BARRETT

THE BEECHAM SEASON ENDS: GILBERT AND SULLIVAN

As a matter of fact there has been no opera in London during the past month—that is to say, grand opera—for the Beecham season at Covent Garden came to an end on December 22, and since then the famous house has been given over to the 'legitimate.' The arrangement illustrates the weakness of our operatic undertakings, for this is just the time of year when opera should be in full force. The fact that it is not, causes it to be regarded as a thing apart and something not included in our everyday lives. Yet until it is, there is not much hope for its preservation as a permanent feature.

I speak of course of representations of opera in the vernacular. The Continental season—generally designated 'grand'—must of necessity, as things are, take place in the summer. But from the time the summer holidays are over, somewhere about the middle of September, until the end of April there should be opera without a break. It would seem as if this is not altogether an impossible suggestion. When I learn that an operatic undertaking has taken a fourteen years' lease of a theatre my hopes rise.

But this I will refer to later—one must be off with the old love before being on with the new. And my first business is to complete the record of the Beecham Company's season at Covent Garden. At a late hour in the season (though why it was left until the last is incomprehensible) Bizet's Eastern opera, 'Djamileh,' was revived. So far as the student of opera is concerned it was a helpful thing to let him or her see and hear this very interesting work. Only the grey-headed or the bald will recall its presentation by Augustus Harris at the same place twenty-six years ago. Then, even with the aid of the French artists who understood its spirit thoroughly, it was evident that it was too small for Covent Garden. Again at Covent Garden, and in the hands of the English singers, this was made amply evident. Its real perspective will be secured when the Company gives it in the smaller theatres on tour. It was very well done with Miss Gladys Ancrum, Mr. Webster Millar, and Mr. Walter Hyde. Certainly good service was rendered in reviving the work, better in fact than by putting on 'La Jolie Fille de Perth.' 'Djamileh' is the real Bizet, and those who know 'Carmen' can fully appreciate its charm. And as everyone knows 'Carmen,' there ought to be plenty of approval for this its predecessor. Félix Clément condemns it as positively disagreeable and Wagnerian—a perfectly reasonable criticism when we consider the contemporary music. But it gives one furiously to think now, more especially as the same programme contained Stravinsky's 'Nightingale,' which to-day might very well be described by all the abusive adjectives that were piled on Bizet fifty years ago. Possibly the time may come when we shall regard the 'Nightingale,' as we do 'Djamileh' to-day, as a pleasant trifle satisfactorily foreshadowing the composer's individual and highly popular style. But that is not yet, and to pervert the comment on the Gilpin ride, 'May I (not) be there to see.'

This to all intents and purposes concluded a rather unsatisfactory season. Success was claimed for it by Sir Thomas Beecham in his valedictory address on the closing night under the term of 'English opera.' It is still true that one swallow does not make a summer, and it is equally voracious that one English opera does not make a season of English opera. As a matter of fact the season has been made up largely of Russian opera as the chief factor. And once again it has not proved wise to rely too much upon Russia. Truth to tell we are not yet ready for the study of these operatic bye-paths represented by the home-made article. At best they will come as an occasional addition to the operatic menu and not as a staple. A further season is promised for next month, when it is hoped there will be more complete realisation of what the public wants.

OPERA AT THE SURREY THEATRE

There seems to be appreciation of this important fact by the Fairbairn Opera Company, which has taken a fourteen years' lease of the Surrey Theatre for the purpose of giving opera for the people. Its plans comprise a good round of the operas the public likes. This is helpful. There are still vast numbers of the people who do not know the 'standard' works as well as they ought to do, and there is a great deal of educative work to be gone through before we can be said to have an opera-going public. Mr. Fairbairn intends to supply this want. He will first of all present the classics by way of 'rudiments,' and will then open a new page of operatic history by revealing the achievement of British composers in the same form. This is what is wanted. Works by Colin MacAlpin and Nicholas Gatty are promised. These are tried hands who proved their worth through the enterprise of Charles Manners, who always did his utmost to encourage native ability. Both are men of undoubted gifts as operatic composers, whose neglect reflects somewhat upon those who have been priding themselves upon the success of English opera under their direction.

GILBERT AND SULLIVAN

The season of Gilbert and Sullivan operas at the Prince's Theatre has continued its course with, if possible, increased approval. Crowded houses have been the rule. There has been no exception. The London public has taken these works to its heart again without question. Even 'The Sorcerer,' one of the earliest, and naturally a tentative effort, was accepted without question, and indeed with the warmest approval. It is not difficult to say why. The truth is that the British people love melody, and here they have it in its most perfect form. They were no haphazard tunes that Sullivan wrote. He took definite inspirations and applied his fine craftsmanship to developing them into things of permanence, with the aid of musicianship of uncommon extent and a resource that brought all phases of musical device into play. The success of the season has been to me one of the most gratifying things I have encountered in music for many years. My one hope is that it will have its effect, and bring about a better quality of work in our lighter musical pieces.

'Princess Ida' with its 'femininity'—to-day accepted as a huge joke—came at the end of the month, and was well performed, Mr. Gordon Cleather joining the company for the production. With the New Year came a combination that evoked memories of the past in the shape of 'Trial by Jury' and 'The Pirates of Penzance.' Gilbert's legal jibe and Sullivan's musical joke, 'Trial by Jury,' was received with keen delight. Mr. Leo Sheffield made an excellent Judge, the best I have seen since Sir Arthur's brother, and the Bellinian effects from the chorus of jurymen and bridesmaids appealed to the audience as glossy new. The 'Pirates of Penzance' struck me as being less well done. The piece has been performed in so many ways. I recollect a performance by children years ago which was ludicrously and unintentionally funny, and I could not get those children—Master Harry Grattan among them—out of my mind. There was also a little tendency to underline 'points,' which spoilt the effect. On the other hand, 'The Sorcerer' was received with the wild enthusiasm one thought was reserved for some modern spectacle on which—per Press pars—the public had been duly informed that thousands had been spent. The operatic mould in which it is cast has so completely changed, that it sounded to a present-day audience as a complete novelty. It was also uncommonly well done, with the help of Miss Nellie Briercliffe, Miss Bertha Lewis, Mr. James Hay, Mr. Gordon Cleather, and Mr. Henry Lytton. Everything was kept within bounds, the points were not forced and so went direct home. A word of praise is due to Mr. Geoffrey Toye for his conducting, which embodies much artistic self-denial, since a modern musician of his calibre must ache to add to Sullivan's score, though to do so would be like touching up a pastel with house paint—and as difficult. The season concluded at the end of the month, the evergreen 'H.M.S. Pinafore' being added before, to everyone's regret, the doors finally closed.

By W. McNAUGHT

London used to be considered a wilderness of choral unfertility in which the smaller growths steadily refused to take root. In plain words, choirs that devoted themselves to the singing of part-songs and madrigals were few and far between, and their abilities limited. To resume metaphor, the wilderness had oases that accentuated the surrounding barrenness. One remembers a choir at Willesden conducted by Mr. J. S. Waddell that used to raise its head at competitions and produce some singing that was really musical; the Oriana Madrigal Society reached a high standard in the West End; Mr. G. Day Winter's work in the East must not be forgotten; and no doubt there were one or two other places where special attention was given to choral singing in its smaller and subtler forms.

But the prospect was bleak compared with the flourishing North, where choral conductors of genius seemed to spring up in every town, and with a wave of the hand, gather round them singers of voice and aptitude in plenty. There was no lack of discussion on the matter, and reasons were easily found. Northern dialect accounted for Northern voice, and London dialect for London lack of voice; the difficulty of bringing singers to rehearsal amid the distractions of London was obviously greater than anywhere else; choral conductors of understanding were rare in the South for want of a tradition to school them; and the stimulus of competition was less active than in the North.

The problem of rehearsal has always played a greater part than is generally known in this distinction between North and South. Before a choir can excel in refined interpretation it must go through a spell of drudgery to obtain its refined technique, and every piece that is undertaken must be treated as a special study in rhythm, phrasing, atmosphere and so forth. A weekly meeting of an hour-and-a-half or two hours for a 'run through,' with a seventy-five per cent. attendance, is a poor approach to the task, but in southern regions it is frequently considered as fulfilling the whole duty of a choral society. In Lancashire and Yorkshire we used to hear of choirs rehearsing daily for weeks in preparation, not for a competition but for a concert!

THE ORIANA MADRIGAL SOCIETY

London's past record in choral singing in its smaller and more interesting form is not one to be proud of. The outlook for the future is too vague to be discerned. The present is just as hazy, but it reveals one bright spot of light shed by the Oriana Madrigal Society, which seems to have added to its vitality during these troublous times. The concert given by this Society at Æolian Hall on December 23, under the direction of Mr. C. Kennedy Scott, was one of the most agreeable events of the musical season, and as good an exhibition of choral interpretation as any that has recently been heard in London. The programme was devoted to Christmas music, but that did not limit the choir's opportunities, as will be seen from the following list:

'Nowell and Sire Christmas'

From a MS. temp. Henry VIII.

'Ave Maria' Palestrina

'Hodie Christus natus est' Sweetinck

Foreign Carols (for vocal quartet)

Arr. by C. Kennedy Scott

'Le vermeil du soleil' (Old French)

'Pastre dei mountagno' (Provençal)

'Les Anges' (Old French)

New Part-song:

'This have I done for my true love' ... Gustav Holst

Part-songs:

'Lord, lovely hast Thou made my dear' Debussy

'Cold winter, villain that thou art' ... Debussy

Traditional Carols:

'On Christmas Night' (Sussex)

Arr. by Vaughan Williams

'I saw three ships' ... Arr. by C. Kennedy Scott

The note of distinction entered into the choral singing from the first. It was conspicuous in the two Latin motets, where smooth, carefully guarded phrasing and the clearest definition in the part-writing are essential. This clearness could only be realised by each section of the choir singing with complete unanimity in every detail of execution and of expression. The long, cleverly-written, carol-like work of Holst, in which abundant effect is made by means proper to vocal writing, was given with facility and assurance, and sympathetically treated.

If the Debussy interpretations were the least satisfactory feature of the concert, the fault lay with the composer, for anything more unvocal could hardly be imagined. The choir was at its best again in the two carols, which were well worth their place in the programme. The vocal writing was fanciful and refined, and the singing delicate, especially in its rhythm.

The tone of the choir was in general highly satisfying, and it had the rare qualities of good balance and blend. Mr. Kennedy Scott is to be congratulated on the all-round capacity of his choir. Such results point to exceptional enthusiasm on the part of the singing members, and a capacity for arduous rehearsal not common in London choralists.

The programme made many demands for solo-singing, which were capably fulfilled by members of the choir. Miss Sibyl Cropper gave three interesting settings by W. G. Whittaker of ancient carol verses. The instrumental music introduced to provide an interval of repose for the choir was very happily chosen. The Philharmonic String Quartet joined in Arnold Bax's 'Irish Elegy' for strings, harp, and cor anglais, and gave two little String Quartets by Frank Bridge—'Sally in our Alley' and 'Cherry Ripe.'

THE ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY

Two concerts of the Royal Choral Society have to be put on record—both of a type that is familiar and designed to set off the capabilities of the choir to best advantage. The programme of carols and other Yuletide music on December 20 was admirably chosen. Besides the tunes which are everybody's property at Christmas time, and which nobody would wish to omit, there were such things as Dr. Davan Wetton's 'Who are ye,' and Parry's arrangement of the ancient carol 'Welcome Yule.' Equally popular with the choral singing was the selection of solo music. Madame Kirkby Lunn being indisposed, Miss Margaret Balfour came in at the last moment to sing Sir Frederick Bridge's adaptation of new words to 'Ombra mai fu,' Mr. George Baker gave Bach's 'Mighty Lord and King All-glorious,' with trumpet obbligato, and Mr. John Coates made a popular success with Mallinson's 'Wassail Song.' Solo items were also given by Miss Doris Vane, and Miss Margaret Champneys joined in some quartet singing. On January 3 the ever-popular 'Messiah' drew a large audience, and was performed in a manner that elicited high praise, the wealth of tone which the choir can produce being of conspicuous service. The soloists on this occasion were Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Robert Radford. At each concert Mr. H. L. Balfour was at the organ, and Sir Frederick Bridge conducted.

OTHER LONDON CHORAL CONCERTS

On December 17 the Dulwich Philharmonic Society gave a very creditable performance of 'A Tale of Old Japan,' under the direction of Mr. Martin Kinglake. There was considerable spirit in the choral singing and the tone was pleasing in all sections. Perhaps the most satisfying feature of the programme was the interpretation of Wilbye's great madrigal, 'Sweet honey-sucking bees.' It was clear that both conductor and singers understood the real nature of madrigal singing, and were able to give effect to it—a rarer achievement than the average efficient performance of an accompanied choral work of the ordinary type. The solo singers were Miss Lillie Aston, Miss Irene Flanders, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. Sydney Clarke.

The South London Philharmonic Society gave 'Messiah' at Goldsmiths' College on December 20, under the direction of Mr. G. H. Heath Gracie. According to local opinion the choral singing was of high quality. It is interesting to hear that the tone of the tenors was brought into proper balance by placing them in front. The soloists were Miss Ida Cooper, Miss Gertrude Macaulay, Mr. Arthur Kellet, and Mr. Percy Snowden. Mr. Alfred J. Sindall was at the organ.

A successful concert in aid of our blinded soldiers and sailors was given at Whitefield's Tabernacle on December 31 by the Novello Choir, under Mr. Harold Brooke's capable and enthusiastic conductorship. In every direction the choral singing was highly creditable, a programme of Carol music being interpreted with appealing expression and pleasant tone. The solos given by Miss Perceval Allen, Mr. John Chandler, and Mr. Ernest Littlewood were popular features, Mr. Chandler's singing in particular making a deep impression. Mr. John E. West was at the organ.

The People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Societies gave an admirable performance of 'Elijah' on January 17 under the direction of Mr. Frank Idle, whose capabilities as a choral trainer were fully exemplified. The tone was rich in volume, and the interpretation spirited and interesting. Solo parts were taken by Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Winifred Lewis, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. David Evans, and the organist was Mr. Herbert Hodge.

BASINGSTOKE.—The newly-formed 'Victory' choir, of which Mr. Duncan Hume is conductor, gave its first concert on December 18. The music performed included Sullivan's 'The Beleaguered,' Pinsuti's 'The sea hath its pearls,' Eaton Fanning's 'The Vikings,' Macfarren's 'You stole my love,' and the March Chorus from 'Tannhäuser.' The choir sang in a manner that gave good promise for its future work. Stanford's 'The Revenge' is in preparation for the next concert.

CRAWLEY.—The newly-formed Crawley and Ifield Choral Society, of which Mr. Courtenay Robinson is conductor, gave its first concert on December 15, with a programme that included Madrigals and Rounds, and Geoffrey Shaw's Shakespearian songs. The choir sang with good tone and careful attention to detail, but the balance could have been improved by the addition of a few more tenors and basses.

HERTFORD.—The East Herts Musical Society has resumed activity after five years of quiescence, and gave a concert at the Drill Hall on December 16. The programme consisted of German's 'Merrie England,' which was attractively sung under the direction of Mr. W. J. Comley. The solo parts were taken by Miss May Kearsey, Miss Mabel Corran, Mr. Ben Morgan, Mr. Harrison Latimer, and Mr. T. Gilbert.

ILFORD.—The Cranbrook Choral Society gave its first concert of the season at the Town Hall on December 30. The choir and orchestra of a hundred and eighty gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' that reflected great credit on the conductor, Mr. Walter Rose, and his supporters. The choral singing gave evidence of careful preparation, the ensemble being of a high order and the interpretation well conceived and carried out. The solo parts were capably sung by Miss Bessie Thompson, Mr. Leonard Lovesey, and Mr. Claude Dyer.

INVERCARGILL, N.Z.—On October 29 and 30 two recitals were given at the Municipal Theatre by the First Church Choir, under the direction of Mr. William Quinn. The choral pieces included Cowen's 'The Heroes,' Cooke's 'Strike the Lyre,' Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to Music' and 'Ode to Peace,' Maunder's 'Border Ballad,' and Percy Fletcher's Choral Fantasia, 'Reminiscences of Verdi.' The orchestra, besides taking part in the accompanied works, played separate selections of a light nature.

MILL HILL.—On December 17, the Mill Hill Choral Society, in which form the pre-war Mill Hill Madrigal Society has been revived, gave a concert under the able direction of Dr. Cane. Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George' were sung in a manner deserving of the highest praise. If good support is provided by singing members and the public this Society should be capable of earning a reputation.

RIPON.—A choir of eighty voices representing the various voluntary choirs at Ripon toured the city at Christmas singing carols and anthems with the object of raising funds for local charity, over £100 being collected. The choir was conducted by Mr. P. R. Pfaff, a lay-clerk at the Cathedral, who has recently been appointed conductor to Ripon Choral Society.

SOUTHSEA.—Gounod's 'The Redemption' was sung in creditable style by the Christ Church Choral Society on December 17, under the direction of Mr. Alfred E. Labdon, with Mrs. C. H. McKay, Mrs. Rogers Cooper, Mr. Eric Tebby, Mr. H. Simpson, and Mr. G. W. Ellum as soloists.

STOCKPORT.—The chief musical factor in this district, we understand, is the Stockport Vocal Union, which has been in existence for forty-seven seasons under the late Dr. Henry Watson and now Dr. T. Keighley. In recent years the choir has been augmented to three times its original strength, a full professional orchestra is engaged for concerts, and greatly increased support has been won from the public. The ambitions of the Society have extended to the performance of such works as Elgar's 'Spirit of England,' Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah,' and concert-versions of opera. Under Dr. Keighley's guidance recent performances have reached a high standard of artistic value,

The Bach Choir of Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, which Mr. Henry T. Finck, of the New York Evening Post, calls 'the best choir in the United States,' has accepted an invitation of the Oratorio Society of New York to sing in New York City on April 10, at a Festival of music to be held under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch. The Choir, under Dr. J. Fred Wolle, will sing choruses from the Mass in B minor and a number of Bach chorales. This will be the third appearance of the Bach Choir in New York City. Previous performances were with the Philharmonic Society of New York. The Choir is preparing for the fifteenth Bach Festival to be held at Lehigh University late in May, when the programme will include the Mass in B minor and other works of Bach.

Chamber Music for Amateurs

[Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur chamber musicians who wish to get into touch with other players. We shall be glad if those making use of the scheme will let us know when their announcements have borne fruit. Failing such notice, advertisements will be inserted three times.]

Lady viola player seeks chamber music or orchestral practice in S.W. district, Streatham or Brixton preferred.—'OMEGA,' c/o Musical Times.

Viola player, chamber music or orchestra. Streatham or neighbourhood; evenings and Sundays.—Miss K., 7, High Road, S.W. 16.

First or second violin.—Romford, or any neighbouring district on G.E.R.; any evening except Tuesday.—FIDDLER, c/o Musical Times.

Wanted.—Violinists (first and second) to join chamber music party. Music of any school. Also, the advertiser is open to join chamber music party as pianist or organist (pipe or reed); evenings.—JOHN THEODORE WISE, 6, Routh Road, Wandsworth Common, S.W. 18.

Pianist wishes to join a small party of musicians (string quartet or otherwise) for practice of good chamber music—not too difficult. Would lend hand parts. West London preferred.—ERNEST A. COUSINS, 160, St. Albans Avenue, Bedford Park, W.

Violinist wishes to meet players for study of classical trios or quartets. Must be good players. He would also like to join a good musical society in Norwood or district. Any afternoon or evening.—CREMONA, c/o Musical Times.

A splendid opportunity for recital work in a well known Central London Church is offered to a really competent string quartet and vocal quartet. Beautiful building with fine acoustic properties: easily accessible by tube, train, tram, or bus. A room in the crypt, containing a grand pianoforte, is available for rehearsals. It is hoped to arrange (week-day) monthly recitals of classical chamber music and unaccompanied motets, &c.—F. G. P., 52, Primrose Mansions, Battersea Park, S.W. 11.

Will 'FRESA' and 'E. S. H.' kindly communicate with the Editor? Their addresses have been mislaid, and letters wait to be forwarded.

MUSIC AND LETTERS: A NEW QUARTERLY

Musical quarterlies have had a chequered fate in this country. Generally speaking, this was due less to any defects in the journals themselves than to the fact that only a mere handful of the public were sufficiently interested in the art to want to read about it. This handful has now grown to such a crowd that a musical journal must be dull indeed if it can find no considerable circle of friends. There should be no danger in the case of the new venture. Music and Letters has only to maintain the standard of its first number to be a brilliant success. It opens with an intriguing preface by the editor, Mr. A. H. Fox-Strangways, and contains articles by G. Bernard Shaw, A. Clutton Brock, H. Plunket Greene, Sydney H. Nicholson, R. R. Terry, Violet Gordon Woodhouse, Harold Monroe, W. Warde Fowler, and Cecil Forsyth, and current notes from Rome, Paris, and London. There are some excellent illustrations, including a portrait of Elgar by William Rothenstein. Delius contributes a characteristic piece for harpsichord.

The articles cover a wide range, and open up some fruitful topics. We wish that space permitted some discussion of points raised by Mr. Clutton Brock in his admirable article 'On Listening to Music,' or by Mr. Nicholson in his practical remarks on 'Music in Country Churches.' Only one of the essays leaves us dissatisfied—Mr. Shaw's appreciation of Elgar. Far too much of it is a depreciation of some of Elgar's contemporaries. Mr. Shaw's picture of 'the little clique of musicians who, with the late Hubert Parry as its centre, stood for British music thirty-five years ago' being 'shocked and irritated' by Elgar's advent is not, we believe, a true one. In any case we do well to remind ourselves that if the Parry group had not 'stood for' British music at that time, we should be very much worse off than we are. Mr. Shaw trots out the old story of Elgar's never having heard of the supertonic, and further informs us that Bach was never taught harmony and counterpoint. And he apparently regards the 'Cockaigne' Overture as Elgar's most representative work! Altogether a typical Shavian utterance of the kind we have grown used to during the past few years—irritating when it is intended to amuse, and funny at some of the other times. It should be added that Music and Letters is admirably printed, and that its headquarters is 18, Berners Street. We wish our new contemporary a long and happy career.

Church and Organ Music

THE EVOLUTION OF THE MODERN ORGAN

BY GEORGE DIXON (Lt.-Col.)

A most interesting booklet under the above title* has been recently published, and seems to have attracted less attention than it deserves. The author tells us at the outset that he has been an enthusiast ever since he was a boy at Harrow and an undergraduate at Oxford. This is quite evident, as for more than thirty years he has been the fortunate possessor of a large organ, originally a three-manual, and now a five-manual instrument. On it he has tried a vast number of experiments, and so has been able to dispel or confirm impressions received when listening to organs in many churches and concert-halls. He records various conclusions, which are naturally full of interest; but he quite properly recognizes that all of them will not receive general assent, and that other points of view are possible. The present writer's experiences at Cambridge and elsewhere correspond to a period beginning some ten or fifteen years later. Though he has not had the advantage of personal experimentation in organ construction, he has for the last quarter of a century or more strenuously advocated various principles, many of which have been adopted in Cathedral and other important instruments. He has, moreover, had the privilege of access to a fine three-manual Willis organ, of which he was the joint designer more than twenty years ago, and has heard and carefully studied a very large number of important instruments all over the kingdom. He therefore feels that he may, without too much presumption, make such comments as the limits of an ordinary article will permit, giving another listener's point of view, and referring at the same time to other examples of development in tonal matters which have apparently been overlooked by the author.

To begin with, 'J. M. B.', in speaking of old organs, states that their defects were largely due to neglect, and he has a good word to say for the reed work. Possibly, in the late 'sixties and early 'seventies, Oxford may have been as fortunate with regard to its old instruments as it was somewhat later in possessing so many fine modern organs. The present writer's experience may also have been unfortunate; but he has found that whatever beauties the diapasons and flutes of the older instruments possessed as individual stops, were spoilt in the ensemble by badly-schemed mixtures and harsh, uneven-toned reeds. These refused to blend, and no amount of tuning, cleaning, or regulation could remedy their inherent defects. It is almost inconceivable that any one who has carefully studied the modern reed-work which Willis initiated, who has experienced its purity and evenness, and realised its possibilities, whether used alone or in combination, could wish to return to the older type.

'J. M. B.'s remarks on the foundation flue-work of the modern Great organs, however, deserve attention. He rightly condemns the tendency to over-do the volume of 8-ft. diapason tone by using excessive scales. He points out that the undue multiplication of such stops, without relation to the upper work, upsets the balance and tends to actual loss of effect through sympathy. Mr. Vincent Willis once remarked that the large Open on the Great should be of such a character and power that it could with suitable diminution be used for the various intervals of the harmonic structure. But who would care to employ modern diapason work on 6-in. or 8-in. pressure in this manner? The proper place for such stops is, like the Tuba, on some other manual where they can be used in contrast to, rather than in combination with, the Great, but where they can when required be coupled to it for special effects. In this way correct balance would under normal circumstances be preserved. The diapasons on the fifth manual at Manchester Cathedral may be cited as an example.

To increase the effect of the Great the author advocates division so as to form two complete departments on separate soundboards, placed side-by-side where the site will allow. He points out that such a plan would enable the ringing brilliancy of the full Great (which is so often required in Church and Cathedral services) to be obtained, but without its power and weight. Bach's organ works also frequently demand some such effect for their proper rendering. This would probably be more conveniently provided for by a fuller development of the unenclosed Choir organ, so as to be a replica of the full Great in miniature. The author seems to have realised this to some extent, for later on, in dealing with control, he suggests that in the case of the Great being divided, one half might be arranged to work when required on the lowest manual. It is rather singular that the division of the Great organs at St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, and Leeds Town Hall, as designed by Best and Smart, should have been abandoned in the subsequent reconstructions. It is also remarkable that until recently Choir mixtures and Chorus reeds were never met with in Cathedral instruments, though concert organs such as St. George's Hall, Liverpool, and the Albert Hall, London, were amply supplied. The author pleads for a greater wealth and variety of manual 16-ft. tone, and emphasizes the importance of the Quint flute 5½-ft. in facilitating the blend of the sub-foundation work. He seems to have had but little experience of the manual 32-ft., and suggests the Quintatön as the most suitable stop for this pitch. Though he does not expressly say so, he appears to regard the Great flue-work as a Mixture on a large scale, with its intervals more or less complete, and the unison the most prominent rank. In practice, such a conception would give a far more coherent result than that produced by the overwhelming 8-ft. tone, with something superadded which bears no true relation to it. If diapasons are to be multiplied, the upper work must be present in proper proportion. As would be expected, the author fully realises the supreme importance of complete harmonic schemes, including the tierce and flat seventh. In this connection, he instances the mixture in Cavaillé-Coll's Blackburn organ, and narrates his subsequent experience at the Paris factory. Incidentally, he shows that such stops, when scientifically designed and artistically carried out, actually cause considerable augmentation of the foundation tone, in addition to imparting a special colouring to the ensemble. As a modern instance, he mentions the example in Messrs. Harrison's Great organ at St. Mary Redcliff, Bristol. As a matter of fact, the complete scheme of harmonic intervals was originally used by them in 1904 at St. Nicholas, Whitehaven. It has been inserted in every Great organ of importance built by them since that time, though in their present reconstruction at Gloucester Cathedral the seventh rank is absent. Such harmonics have also been occasionally used by other builders, and an example will appear in the new Cathedral organ at Liverpool, to which instrument it is curious that no reference whatever should be made. The Whitehaven Great organ, by the way, exemplifies quite a number of other features the author advocates, including a wealth of sub-foundation, the stopped Quint, 5½-ft., and the 32-ft. Quintatön, not to mention a secondary Great organ within the tonal structure, giving true Choir organ effects. The Great has no reeds of its own, but the ensemble is very satisfying nevertheless. This feature is probably due to the unusual completeness of the flue-work tonal structure. It may be noted that the manual Quint was retained in the reconstructions at St. John's and Trinity College, Cambridge, and was actually inserted at Ely in the 1908 rebuild.

With regard to flue-work generally, the author does not appear to appreciate the Schulze type of diapason, and though he mentions the tapered family of Spitzflötes and Gemshorns, he scarcely alludes to their valuable counterpart, the beautiful family of Geigens, which have become a notable feature in many modern instruments. Where resonant buildings are concerned, the present writer prefers the fine, broad tone imparted by the low 2/7 mouth diapason of the Schulze model. It has the additional advantage of blending well with the upper work and the reeds.

With regard to reed tone, the author gives due credit to the splendid work done by Cavaillé-Coll. He scarcely appears to do full justice to the great revolution initiated by Willis in the early 'seventies, when he introduced closed reeds with a triangular opening voiced on increased wind-pressure. For more than twenty years afterwards his organs stood head and shoulders above his contemporaries, largely on account of their magnificent reed stops; and modern English voicing is for the most part merely a further development of the methods he introduced. On the other hand, it is quite likely that the earlier work of the brothers George and Henry Willis was to some extent influenced by the Frenchman. In discussing the question of reed work with the present writer, Henry Willis remarked shortly before his death, 'Yes; Cavaillé-Coll's reeds are very good, but mine are quite different.' This generous statement made by perhaps the greatest organ-builder the world has ever seen with reference to the work of another almost equally great, is of course profoundly true. And there is ample room for both.

A 'NEW FINGERIT ORGANEIST.'

In reference to the article in our January issue, 'What was a "New fingerit organeist"?' by Mr. Clement Antrobus Harris, a number of queries and conclusions are put before the readers of the Musical Times for further elucidation. Dr. Grattan Flood kindly sends us the following communication:

Mr. Harris does not seem to be aware that the Irish monks of Malmesbury had organs, as is evident from the history of St. Aldhelm and St. Dunstan, long before the coming of the Normans; in fact, in the 8th century. Thus the Scottish claim as being 'more advanced in regard to organs in pre-Reformation days than most Englishmen—or even Scotsmen themselves—realise,' is not strictly accurate. In fact Scotland, even according to Mr. Harris himself, is four hundred years behind England, because his historical evidence begins with 1250.

The Mallerimi Bible picture of 1490, in which the organ is used in combination with the lute, is not 'unique,' as Mr. Harris states. As a matter of fact, a similar illustration of organ and lute-player occurs in several 15th-century works, and the interested reader will find one in such an accessible book as Mr. Abdy-Williams's 'Story of the Organ.' Mr. Harris says that he cannot recall 'any representation in which both organ and lute are played simultaneously'; but a glance at page 37 of the 'Story of the Organ' will convince the most sceptical.

Mr. Harris's photographic reproduction of the magnificent panel painting by Hugo van der Goes does not at all bring out the salient features of the Flemish painter's work of 1470—formerly in Holyrood Palace—a wing of the Trinity altar-piece. The best illustration of this remarkable picture, or diptych, is in Dalzell's 'Musical Memoirs of Scotland' (1849). However, neither Dalzell nor Mr. Harris mentions a most important fact, namely, that the Provost is represented as kneeling before St. Cecilia, who is playing the organ.

This panel picture—now in Buckingham Palace—was exhibited at the Stuart Exhibition in 1889, and again in October, 1911, at the Grafton Galleries, London, lent by King George V.

The music score supposed to be played by St. Cecilia is the first verse of 'O Lux beata Trinitas.'

LONDON SOCIETY OF ORGANISTS

At the annual general meeting held at St. Matthew's, Denmark Hill, on January 17, Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson was elected president for 1920. The vacancies on the committee were filled by Messrs. E. d'Evry, E. T. Cook, E. A. Coombs, J. T. Corbin, A. J. Hadrill, with B. Herrick Edwards to fill a vacancy by resignation. Between fifty and sixty new members were elected during the year. The Society's prize of £5 5s. for a piece for violin and organ was won by Dr. C. W. Pearce.

Mr. Thomas Powell, for over twenty-five years principal alto in the choir of Lincoln's Inn Chapel, has just retired. He has been actively engaged in choir work for upwards of fifty-two years, and was formerly principal alto at St. Anne's, Soho, St. Michael's, Cornhill, and St. Alban's, Holborn. He is one of the oldest professional members of the Abbey Glee Club, and was for many years conductor of the Owl Musical Club.

A choir and organ recital was given at Brighton Parish Church on December 16, the programme being drawn from the 'three B's.' The choir sang 'Hallelujah' from 'The Mount of Olives,' 'How lovely are thy dwellings fair,' from Brahms's 'Requiem,' and one of the boys gave an air from a Bach Cantata. Mr. Chastey Hector's organ solos included Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor. These recitals take place monthly, the collections being chiefly responsible for the fact that the choir fund begins the present year with a substantial balance in hand—an excellent example of self-help.

Mr. J. A. Fuller-Maitland gave an organ recital at Mayfield, Sussex, on December 28, with a programme in two parts, 'Remembrance' and 'Rejoicing.' The former included Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Attwood's 'Dirge,' Parry's 'Rockingham,' and Alan Gray's 'Recessional.' In the second part were Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C, Franck's 'Pièce Héroïque,' and Faulkes' Fantasia on Christmas Carols.

The Christ Church Enfield Musical Society recently held a Memorial and Thanksgiving Festival, singing Gounod's 'De Profundis' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' besides two small choral works by the conductor, Dr. Harold Watts. In March the Society is performing Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' Bridge's 'Rock of Ages,' and the music of a mystery play, 'The Mantle,' by Dr. Watts.

At St. Edward's Parish Church, Romford, in December, Spohr's 'God, Thou art great' and Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' were performed by augmented choir, orchestra, and organ. The soloists were Miss Joan Cross, Mrs. M. Saltwell, and Messrs. Hammond and Saltwell. Mr. H. Alden presided at the organ, and Mr. A. C. Chappell-Haverson conducted.

Part I of 'Messiah' was given by the choir at the Nottingham Central Mission (Halifax Place Chapel) after the evening service, on December 21. The soloists were Madame Gladys Webster, Madame Ethel Parkin, Mr. Herbert Gutteridge, and Mr. Pattison Stoton. Mr. E. M. Barber, conducted, and Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson was the organist.

The Borough Council of Stoke-on-Trent has appointed Mr. Sydney H. F. Wéal to be borough organist. There were sixty applicants for the post. Mr. H. F. Ellingford adjudicated at the competition, in which a leet of six took part.

The organ at the Italian Church, Hatton Garden, has been reconstructed by Messrs. John Compton, and is now a four-manual instrument with forty-six stops. A recital will be given on Sunday, February 8, at 7 o'clock, by Mr. James I. Taylor, of Nottingham.

At Malvern Priory Church, on January 8, the Oratorio Choir sang 'Messiah,' with orchestral accompaniment. Dr. Louis Hamand conducted. There was a crowded congregation, and the collection amounted to over £64.

On January 10 a musical service was held at the City Temple. The Band of H.M. Scots Guards played, and vocal solos were given by Miss Bessie Lang and Mr. John Collett. Mr. Allan Brown presided at the organ.

New Music

BY WILLIAM CHILD

SONGS

The crop of new songs is amazing. They resolve themselves roughly into four groups. There are the obvious ballads of the type to which the great heart of the British public still beats true, those of a better kind (sometimes not very happily called 'art-songs'), the serious songs by well-equipped modern composers who have made no obvious break with traditional methods, and the more advanced type wherein the player wrestles with a difficult solo while the singer gropes round finding notes which at first sight seem to belong to another song. Sometimes such works yield good results for the necessary labour: occasionally they end as they began—a puzzle. The ballads need not detain us long. They will receive ample publicity at the hands of singers, and only a few of the best will be mentioned here. Two excellent specimens of the straightforward song are Laxton Eyre's 'Life's Highway' and A. Herbert Brewer's 'When all the world is young.' The former is for medium voice, and the latter is published in keys to suit baritones and tenors. The words of Dr. Brewer's song are the well-known lines of Charles Kingsley. Both these songs are published by Novello. Landon Ronald's 'Four Silhouettes' (Enoch & Sons) are settings of lyrics by Arthur Symonds, published together. They are of the 'art-song' type, and are just what we expect from the composer—fluent, effective, not strikingly original, and employing the emotional means that have done duty for thousands of song composers, and will do duty for thousands more. Ernest Austin's 'Wind Flowers' (J. H. Larway) is equally attractive, and somewhat fresher in method. Cyril Scott's 'Tranquillity' is No. 1 of 'Two Songs Without Words,' for voice and pianoforte (Elkin & Co.). So few song texts are heard, and of these so few are worth hearing, that this method of merely vocalizing has something to be said for it. Mr. Scott's music is as fatigued and nebulous as ever, with occasional moments of genuine charm. Isidore de Lara's 'Tired' (Elkin & Co.) is a setting of some lines beginning 'I am tired to-night.' The music expresses this faithfully, and goes a little farther in suggesting some slight biliousness as well. From Winthrop Rogers come four songs by Frank Bridge—'Into her keeping,' 'The last Invocation,' 'What shall I your true love tell?' 'Tis but a week.' The composer has already established himself as one of our best song-writers, and these four songs will add to his reputation. I am especially struck by 'The last Invocation,' a very significant setting of some lines by Walt Whitman.

J. C. Squire's poem, 'The March,' is so gripping that no music can add much, if at all, to its significance. Granville Bantock's setting (J. & W. Chester) has some fine moments, but the honours rest with the words. The composer uses a repeated A throughout, and obtains plenty of harmonic variety without being far-fetched. The song should make a great effect. A word is due to the arresting black-and-white sketch by Mr. Nevinson on the cover, an example of modernity that we can all appreciate.

From J. & W. Chester come also a delightful little song, 'Le Coucou,' by Georges Renard, and a beautifully expressive example of Joseph Jongen's art in 'Calmes, aux quais deserts.' Both these have English versions by Mrs. Newmarch.

Peter Warlock is a song composer who has the root of the matter in him. In the November Musical Times I spoke of three of his songs as 'remarkable pieces of work.' The expression is one that should be used with caution, especially to-day, when there is a natural tendency to hail all our young geese as swans. But three more of Mr. Warlock's songs have arrived in the meantime, and they confirm my enthusiastic opinion. They are entitled 'Lullaby' (a setting of Dekkers's 'Golden slumbers'); 'Dedication,' words by Sir Philip Sidney; and 'Take, O take those lips away.' 'Lullaby' is a delicious mixture of the archaic and the modern. The familiar Shakespeare lines are given a setting full of subtle simplicity. 'Dedication' is a passionate affair with a pianoforte part in which good players will revel.

One or two specimens of the ultra-modern type of song are held over for the present.

Oddly, some of the most charming songs of the whole batch come not from a music publisher but from the Poetry Bookshop, in the form of the December, 1919, number of the Monthly Chapbook. There are four of them—'Nod,' by C. Armstrong Gibbs; 'At the turn of the burn,' by Malcolm Davidson; 'Melmillo,' by Clive Carey; and 'Arabia,' by W. Denis Browne. The words of the first, third, and fourth are by Walter de la Mare. All these songs are good examples of modern work, with the fourth slightly less successful than its companions, owing to the harmonic experiments being not always convincing.

Six books of songs for use at Trinity College Local Examinations come from Winthrop Rogers. Each album contains nine songs, mostly by old English composers, and delightful ditties most of them are. It is good to find Trinity College doing something for this neglected branch of our native music, but an emphatic protest is called for regarding the accompaniments supplied by Dr. Vincent, the editor. There are far too many chromatic progressions, and far too liberal a use of such well-worn and cheap emotional accessories as the flattened submediant—irritating in any music, and especially so when plastered on to straightforward tunes by Lawes, for example:

which pleases Dr. Vincent so much that he uses it four times in Lawes's 'Gather ye rosebuds.'

It would be easy to fill a page with examples of such idealism. And here is a phrase from the last verse of 'Forley's' 'Now is the month of Maying' (here called 'The Adness of Spring,' the original title not being good enough):

If the dainty nymphs could speak, they would probably enquire as to their harmonic fate had there been another verse. I suggest the following as being richly expressive of the gladness of spring:

Seriously, I cannot imagine much worse models to put to the hands of students than the harmonizations of some of these songs.

VOLONCELLO

A Sonata for 'cello and pianoforte, by Frederick Delius, written in 1916, has just been published by Winthrop Rogers. It bears no key-signature, but has perhaps rather more to do with D than with any other key. The title is very loosely used, for the work is in one movement, with a brief middle section by way of slow movement, followed by a resumption of the opening material with very little change of treatment. The part for the solo instrument is entirely melodic; there is no showy cadenza or any other writing of the purely 'passage' type of which we usually get far too much in string sonatas, and no double stopping until the final chord. The melody is mostly straightforward—even a trifle obvious at times. The accompaniment consists of a rich harmonic background. As the richness results from harmonic blocks rather than from a well-knit texture, it is perhaps not of the type that stands wear. One gets an impression at times that the melody is given rather more than it can carry—it is overdressed, so to speak. For example, here is a characteristic treatment of a simple tune:

Such passages should appear as rare and refreshing fruit. When they constitute the bulk of the menu, as in this Sonata, they are apt to become cloying. The middle section is a beautiful, dreamy lento, all too short. Although the Sonata is open to the charge of over-lusciousness, its constant flow of ideas, and the grateful character of the solo part, should ensure popularity.

Six Morceaux, 'Par la Fenêtre Ouverte,' by Louis Delune (J. & W. Chester), are delightful little fancies, dealing with such subjects as the wind in the willows, pattering rain, the butterfly—subjects that are a perennial fount of inspiration to composers. M. Delune has the right light touch, the writing for both instruments being at once suggestive and reticent. The pieces are only moderately difficult, but call for taste and imagination in the players. Granville Bantock's arrangement for 'cello and pianoforte of the Hebrew melody 'Hamabdil' (J. & W. Chester) is more straightforward, the chief demand being for a broad cantabile and plenty of tone.

VIOLIN

Purcell's Three- and Four-part Sonatas for strings are amongst the composer's best works. They ought to be in regular use wherever a few string players are gathered together. That they are not so is due to the fact that there appears to be no edition of a cheap and handy kind. However, 'half a loaf,' &c., so we welcome Harriet Solly's arrangement for violin solo of Nos. 1 and 2. The transcriber points out that her object is to add to the slender stock of works available for unaccompanied violin, there being at present little beyond the solo sonatas of Bach. She has worked on the principle of omitting such notes or parts of the original as are impossible on one instrument. The result should be valuable as studies, though they necessarily give only a sketch of Purcell's delightful part-writing.

PIANOFORTE

From Messrs. Elkin come the first three of a series of pieces by Albert Coates—'Idyll,' and 'In Memoriam,' the latter consisting of two short pieces, 'Angelus' and 'Lacrymosa.' All three belong more or less to the ostinato family, 'Angelus' making effective use of a delicate chiming figure high on the keyboard, 'Lacrymosa' dealing in various ways with a little syncopated tune in an inner part, and the 'Idyll' being almost entirely founded on the two-bar phrase with which the piece opens. One naturally looks for Russian influence; probably most of us would have imagined some even if it had been absent. It is there, however—a slight flavour of such composers as Rebikov and Glière, though in mood 'Lacrymosa' recalls the suppressed and austere emotion of Ravel's 'Pavane pour une Infante defunte.' The pieces are fairly difficult, and show distinction on every page. It is announced that Messrs. Elkin are to be the sole publishers of Mr. Coates's pianoforte music and songs.

William Baines's 'Paradise Gardens' (Elkin) calls for very skilful use of the pedals in addition to good all-round technique. The composer uses three staves at times, but even then finds the accommodation hardly sufficient. There is a fine note of ecstasy about this piece, and a good player will be well repaid for the necessary pains. By the way, Mr. Baines set out to use English for his directions as to expression, but evidently found the tongue inadequate. Hence such curious combinations as 'little rit.,' 'much rit.,' 'accel. (not too much).' What is the matter with 'retard much'? And, to be consistent, why not 'in time' for 'a tempo'?

CHORAL MUSIC

Highly expressive is John E. West's arrangement for T.T.B.B. of 'The Bonnie Banks o' Loch Lomond.' It is designed for solo voices, with the refrain in chorus, but it can also be sung as a quartet or chorus. The first verse is given to the highest voice, the others entering at the end of each phrase. In verse 2 the second tenor sings the air, while his colleagues add expressive counter-themes. The last verse consists of a plainer harmonization with the tune again at the top. The refrain has the same setting for each verse, save in the last, where the final cadence is lengthened with very happy effect. The harmony is simple and natural throughout, and the vocal writing of the flowing and grateful kind that we expect from the composer.

School choirs and Girls' Club singing classes will welcome Edward German's 'Shepherds' Dance,' an arrangement, by the composer, of the second of the ever-popular 'Henry VIII.' set. The music is transposed to the key of D, and laid out for two trebles and pianoforte. The voice parts do not consist merely of the dance-tune: sometimes they are independent, with an occasional long sustained note or a fragment of imitative work. The accompaniment is practically the original dance slightly simplified. W. G. Rothery has been very happy in writing the words, and the whole thing hangs so well together as to give one the impression of a singularly spontaneous part-song rather than of an arrangement from an instrumental source. It should be added that the work is not difficult, and that tonic sol-fa and old notation appear on the same copy.

CAROLS

Too late for notice last month came 'The Cowley Carol Book,' Series 2, and 'The English Carol Book,' also Series 2, both published by Mowbray. The former carries on from No. 66 to 102, and like its predecessor is a mine of delightful musical antiques. That these are largely from native sources is all to the good. The first series contained too great a proportion of German Chorales, which, fine as they were, demanded too stately a gait for carolling purposes. Most of the melodies in the new set are of the right quaint and homely flavour, and have been perfectly harmonized by Dr. Charles Wood. The Rev. G. R. Woodward is again responsible for the writing and translating of the words, a guarantee of the highest excellence. The first series of 'The English Carol Book' reached such a high standard that its successors may fall short of it and still be first-rate. This is the case with the book under notice. It contains nothing quite so good as the best in Series 1, but still is a worthy pendant, with new tunes by Sydney H. Nicholson, John Ireland, Martin Shaw, Rutland Boughton, and Vaughan Williams. Three of the best tunes, however, are from an old gallery tune book, sterling simple airs well worth revival. Probably hundreds of such tunes are lying hidden in dusty MS. books in country churches, awaiting a rescuing hand. Here is work for church folk-song collectors.

Mr. Clifton Cooke's series of lectures on singing, at King George's Hall, realised £150 for the Y.M.C.A. Wounded Soldiers' Fund.

Letters to the Editor

NATIONALITY IN MUSIC

SIR,—That there is at present a serious divergence of opinion on the above question is a matter that must have occurred to all thoughtful musicians, and it is serious because it is bound to react on the question of reconstruction and development so far as British music is concerned. We seem at present to be divided into two camps: those who think that the development of British music must be based on the expression of a national idiom derived from our folk-song, and those who maintain that nationalism is of a purely secondary nature, and that music must be judged as music, irrespective of any national basis of conception or influence. Which of the two is right? Which of the two ideas is to be our guiding policy? To which of the two parties is the average music-loving public, now anxious to be instructed and led, to look for guidance? Does the truth of the matter lie in viâ media? Can it be possible that both parties are not really in conflict on the main issue, but are approaching it from different standpoints? In any case it seems a very vital thing that we should try to find some settled policy to guide us, if we as musicians are to help and guide the public—who, I am sure, now really desire guidance—and if in addition we are to work on the best educative lines in our schools. Let us ask ourselves these very pertinent questions: Is the work of men like Cecil Sharp—who has spent infinite care, patience, and skill in collecting our folk-song lore, and making both the younger and older generation better acquainted with this mine of national song—practically useless, so far as its influence on the development of British music is concerned? Is the work of, for instance, the British Music Society, in spreading a knowledge of our own music among the people, all on wrong lines? Are men like Mr. Edwin Evans, with his admirable articles on 'Modern British Composers,' focussing public attention in the wrong direction? Is Mr. Percy Scholes, with his instructive lectures, and the strong advocacy of National Music always pleaded by the Music Student, doing the wrong thing? Is the policy of this journal towards British music sound? Are the views of such a great thinker as Sir Henry Hadow hopelessly pro-Nationalist? Or can it be that the other party, who regard music as Universal before National, are perfectly right? I read Mr. Arthur L. Salmon's article (Musical Times, December, 1919) with great interest, and am bound to admit that it contains much sound and logical reasoning. His point seems to be that the whole must be looked at rather than the part, and that the national element must always be of secondary importance and interest. No one I think can deny this, nor do I think the advocates of folk-song and national idiom would disagree with him. The point is whether those who wish for Universalism in music really mean Cosmopolitanism? Are they arguing over a question of nomenclature? Do they mean that, for example, French music is music in spite of its being individually French, or would they be willing to admit that its merit as real music is largely due to its national and distinctive characteristics? Again, would they agree that until recent years we have had no English music since the days of Purcell, who, though probably reflecting French and Italian influences, still wrote in the national idiom?

There is some danger in pushing this question of universality in music to the fore at the present time, when the crying need is for people to know more of the music their own countrymen have produced in the past, and further when everyone of us should, each in his own way, strive to encourage native art and native composers. There is, of course, the tendency to go too far when trying to right a great wrong, but that is a fault that leans to virtue's side. The 'Universalists,' for want of a better name, seem to resemble the man who, in the cause of philanthropy, helped the family next door but starved his own! That 'music is a universal language' is one of those insidious half-truths that has worked and will work tremendous mischief if not checked and pinned down.

I have always admired the brilliant critiques and writings of Mr. Ernest Newman, but, with many, regret the attitude he takes up on the question of nationality in music and the influence of folk-song. His opinions in this direction lead one to think, unwillingly it may be, that he has little if any sympathy with the future of native art or any wish to encourage its exponents. His recent article in the Observer (December 7) confirms this. Here are some of his remarks: 'The modern English school—whatever that may be, I know of no such "school" myself. . . . How encouraging and how complimentary to English musicians, dead and living! We used to have the effrontery to think that after some years of German hypnotism we found ourselves, and began to be ourselves, with the production of Parry's 'Prometheus.' Then again, re 'Vaughan Williams,' 'As a composer he hardly ranks beside men like Delius and Elgar, who do not care a brass farthing for any theories about folk-song.' I for one don't think that Vaughan Williams bothers about the 'theories' of folk-song. There is not much to 'theorise' about when you have the facts. This composer has saturated himself with the spirit of folk-song, and English music has gained thereby. Again, Mr. Newman says: 'It is pure delusion to suppose that a great work of art can be made by piecing together a number of folk-tunes.' I don't imagine that any 'Nationalist' is so deluded: the people who favour folk-song, and have studied it faithfully, know too much about organic unity and art-structure—as exhibited therein in its embryonic form—to entertain such a foolish idea. Again: 'The really great men are too full of ideas of their own . . . to have much time or inclination for making musical stews or hashes out of other men's ideas.' But surely on this basis the great masters have given us many 'musical stews and hashes,' and we have not objected to the menu! In the next sentence we are told that 'personality is the only thing that matters in a composer.' Of course this is so in every artist. I have always thought and held that in music the idea and its expression are one and the same thing—that either cannot exist alone. It was not what Handel borrowed, but what he made of it, that counted. Then, strangely enough, Mr. Newman pulls himself up, and, Balaam-like, turns from cursing to blessing: 'If he can give full expression to a genuine personality in folk-song idiom . . . well and good.' So that, after all, the still, small voice comes after the earthquake, and we are told it is not such a wicked thing to base our music on folk-song idiom if there is personality behind it. It does seem a great pity that a man of Mr. Newman's force and understanding should 'see red' when 'Nationalism in Music' comes in sight, and yet turn aside to err with the 'Nationalists,' who, as he says, 'think loosely.'

To sum up, at the present juncture, when we want to rouse people and satisfy their musical hunger, are we best going to do this by discouraging or encouraging them in their own native art? Is it to be taught or implied that we can best progress by leaving our own art to take care of itself and concentrating on universality, or by teaching the people that they have behind them a rich store of beautiful music of their own, worthy to be proud of, and that what England has done in the past she can do in the future? It seems to me the opposing forces meet on common ground on this crucial point: 'We will accept anything that is real music, whether it has a national idiom behind it or not.' Good; but the next point has to be answered: 'What, prior to 1914, was the average idea of real music, whence came it, and how was it fostered for so long?' We can answer this easily, and find the remedy.—Yours, &c.,

HAROLD E. WATTS.

THE RHYTHMICAL SENSE AND THE FOLK-DANCE

SIR,—Most musicians have witnessed with pleasure the revival of the Morris dance and the Country dance as demonstrated by the English Folk-Dance Society under the direction of Mr. Cecil Sharp. We have remarked 'How splendid and healthy for the people,' and—there most of us have stopped.

This Christmas tide, however, I myself have been initiated into some of the—very simple—mysteries of the Country dance, and it suddenly struck me how very neglectful all our music-teaching institutions have been in not at once recognizing the immense power for good, musically, we have at our very doors.

Our British students notoriously are sadly lacking in rhythmical sense; and we have elaborate schemes for ear-training, resorting to all kinds of makeshift devices for teaching this, the very foundation upon which all music is built—the rhythmical sense—instead of teaching it directly and inevitably by the only natural means, just by such Folk-dances. Nevertheless, it needs but little reflection to prove to us that musical rhythm has arisen, in the first instance, from the psychological effect of the walking stride and its modifications—the movements of running and dancing.

Hence we see how the widespread teaching of the delightful and health-giving movements of the Folk-dance would inevitably strengthen our position, musically, as a nation.—Yours, &c.,

TOBIAS MATTHAY.

THE ALTO VOICE

SIR,—In reply to your correspondent who last month asked what had become of the alto voice, and referred to its rarity, it is not without interest to note that in an old pamphlet of the performance of 'Messiah' at Bristol Grand Musical Festival for the Infirmary, on June 16, 1814, there is no mention of the contralto voice, as we now find it, in the cast for the performance. Instead, the male alto was used, a Mr. Garbett. There were two sopranos, including Madame Catalani; and in addition a boy's voice, with two tenors, one of whom was Braham. 'Behold, a Virgin' and 'O thou that tellest' were sung by the male alto, and the air 'He was despised' was sung by the chief tenor! 'He shall feed His flock' and 'Come unto Him' were classed as a duet, and sung by the boy, a Master Stansbury, and one of the sopranos. 'Their sound is gone out' was sung as a quartet by the boy, the alto, and a tenor and bass, then repeated by the chorus. The cast is a strange sidelight on oratorio singing a hundred years ago.—Yours, &c.,

Bristol,

F. K. LYNE.

December, 1919.

SIR,—I would be glad of a little space to reply to the letter of Mr. Plumiree on the alto voice. That there is a prejudice against the male alto I will admit, and also must agree that in days gone by there has been ground for such prejudice. The reason of this I think can be traced to the organists themselves, because in the old days an alto was not expected to be a soloist, and so long as he could sustain the alto part in chorus work he was considered satisfactory. But in these later days, when the important organist posts in Cathedrals are being held by young and enthusiastic musicians, there has been introduced into the service of the Church more modern and elaborate compositions, and the standard expected of the male alto has been considerably raised, with the consequence that there has been a great improvement both in range, beauty of tone, and musical ability in the type of man now coming forward. But it must be admitted that to a certain degree the prejudice still remains. I would therefore suggest to the organist who is blessed with a good alto, treasure him, for he is worth his weight in gold (there is no need to worry at this statement, for altos are usually light-weights). Give him plenty of work to do, and in the singers' jargon, don't divide all the alto 'fat' between the other parts until you have satisfied yourself that your alto is incapable of sustaining the 'fat' himself, otherwise his artistic soul will be so wounded that he will 'sicken and so die.' Let the demand in male altos be for good musicians, with good range along with purity and beauty of tone, and I am sure this type of man is procurable, for so superior a demand will ensure a superior supply, and unfair prejudice will die.—Yours, &c.,

'ALTO.'

SIR,—I should like to record that I gave a vocal recital in a West-End concert-hall in 1907, but I cannot put my hand upon a programme. Recognizing that too many alto solos would be monotonous, from my répertoire of about a hundred solos I selected and sang thirteen as varied in character as possible, interspersing these with help from Miss Constance Waters (soprano), Miss Violet Sinclair (pianoforte), Miss Muggeridge (violin), Mr. George West (bass, of St. James's Church Choir, Piccadilly), and Mr. Arthur Helmore, who contributed humorous recitations. We spent a pleasant evening.—Yours, &c.,

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE ACCOMPANIST

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me through your columns to draw the attention of concert-givers to the necessity for providing the best accompanist possible. What a great wrong it is to allow Mr. — or Miss —, because he or she happens to be a relative or friend perhaps of people interested, to sit on the pianoforte stool and try to pass as the 'real thing.' What an insult to the art, the artist, the audience. What a wrong to the 'real thing,' who is probably sitting at home instead of being in the deserved position. And what a poor incentive is thus given to the really gifted accompanist. Yet this sort of travesty is an everyday occurrence. A great deal rests in the hands of the artists—let them object, and object strongly, to being insulted in this way, and they will soon see the effect of such a universal movement. But it seems a fact that only the very few have the pluck to stand by their convictions. Let us pull ourselves together and show that we must have the best accompanist obtainable in the district if we are expected to do our best. That is all we ask—the best accompanist in the district.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES TREE.

CHORAL SOCIETIES

SIR,—It was exceedingly refreshing to read Mr. W. McNaught's remarks on the choral problem in this month's issue of the Musical Times.

I am uncharitable enough to say that the new conditions are a manifestation of general decline of musical feeling due no doubt to the increasing demands of a materialistic age. As every choral conductor knows, it is a comparatively easy matter to get plenty of sopranos of a type, but it is quite another matter to get singers for the remaining parts. Needless to say the latter require a certain amount of musical intelligence; the majority of the former, however, are able to get along without. To meet the new conditions that Mr. McNaught refers to, it is suggested that this majority should be eliminated from all choral societies that aspire to any artistic productions. Doubtless it would be a very heroic operation in view of a more confined general interest, to say nothing of other considerations, but it would be worth while. To listen to a choir that does not blend is something like eating chaff.

Alas, that the public should be deluded by the mere window-dressing that numbers provide!—Yours, &c.,

TO BRITISH COMPOSERS

SIR,—Kindly allow me the courtesy of your columns to draw the attention of British composers to the invitation of Mr. Appleby Matthews, the well-known conductor, who is desirous of performing some modern orchestral music at his forthcoming series of concerts at Birmingham. British composers who desire to avail themselves of this opportunity should send particulars of their works to Mr. Appleby Matthews at 59, Corporation Street, Birmingham.—Yours, &c.,

'CONCERNING CUTS'

SIR,—I am much indebted to Mr. Lionel Ovenden for his letter 'Concerning Cuts,' for it gives me valuable help in proving my case. He says 'no conductor would dream of leaving out any passage of Schubert's C major Symphony. The late M. Satonoff did actually do so: so also does Sir Henry Wood.' As regards the Symphony in question 'emptying a concert hall,' I can only wonder whether Mr. Ovenden has ever been at a London concert at which the Symphony has been the last number in the programme. As for emptying the hall in the metaphorical sense, I well remember a case when the Symphony was announced and the booking was deplorable; another work was substituted and the hall was well filled. Result, a great many who would have liked to hear the work were deprived of the pleasure. Were it of reasonable length, they would probably have the pleasure oftener than they do. Which is the better way? As to the artistic crime of playing a detached movement, is Bach's Chaconne an independent piece? And what will Mr. Ovenden say to Mr. Lamond, who, at the Queen's Hall concert on January 11, played the Scherzo from Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 31, No. 3, a thing which Mr. D'Albert often did before him. Yet we protest that we never 'cut'!—Yours, &c.,

A. KALISCH.

MEYERBEER AND HIS EXECUTORS

SIR,—The interesting letters of Mr. Tom S. Wotton and Mr. Arthur Hervey in your issues of last October and November concerning Meyerbeer's unpublished compositions may require some explanation from me. During the year 1913 my much lamented friend and faithful collaborator on my long delayed 'Dictionary of Writers on Music,' the late Lieut. Louis Arthur Klemantaski, was informed by a prominent member of Meyerbeer's family that 'no further musical compositions, authorised autobiography, diary, and collection of letters of the Master will be printed and published.' This was settled at a family gathering held at Berlin many years ago. The decision is evidently final.—Yours, &c.,

A LESSON FROM PARIS

SIR,—It was noted in the Musical Times for November (page 608) that Elgar's first Symphony was to be played at a Lamoureux Concert in Paris on October 26, under Mr. Landon Ronald. The remark was made editorially that the verdict was awaited with interest. The verdict is now to hand.

Our French friends do not like Elgar. M. Florent Schmitt says that the opening melody 'stripped the mystery and caused all hopes to fall flat.' He seems to think that the work is Elgar's last symphony, and prays that it may prove to be literally so. In the course of his critique he refers to Gerald Berners (sic).

I wish to make a brief comment on one of M. Schmitt's remarks, and to point an obvious moral. I wish also to indicate why so many Englishmen find modern French music so exceedingly (may I use the word?) tiresome. The remark is this: 'For the next forty minutes we had time to remember Mendelssohn, Brahms, and Tchaikovsky, who had little enough to say for themselves, but who managed to say it in their own way, using a vocabulary which, if limited, was still their own.'

My comment is of general character. In the conduct of life and art, companionship, and association with things of interest, it is better to be in contact with what reminds us of something else rather than with something that reminds us continuously and exclusively of itself only. The best companionship is of course that which carries us both out of ourselves into a large and universal world, making us conscious of things external to ourselves, yet at the same time identifying us with them and demonstrating that we are part of them. By such companionship we discover what we actually are, which is the end and object of life. But since this best is not always available, the less good must be accepted; and of the two minor alternatives it is more grateful and tolerable to be with what reminds us of other quite definite things rather than to be with what is egotistically restricted to itself. The latter tires. It is one-sided, dogmatic, and insistent. It leaves no scope to be oneself. It dries us up. In the end it parches us. The former interests us at the least. It affords at the least some slight opportunity to exercise ourselves, and to escape from the insistent idiosyncrasy of our companion.

Now modern French music is concerned with the exposition of itself only. It is as the conversation of a man who says: 'Here I am. I alone am a thing of interest. Nothing else matters, and if it does, it is my opinion of it that matters most. Attend therefore to me. I am personal, but my personality is delightful. And observe how cleverly I display myself.' For a little while such a man is a useful and amusing companion. He gives us material for study. He teaches us what to avoid in ourselves. But for a lifetime he is a bore. As a substitute for other more vital and moving companions he is a drought. Loneliness is better, for that gives us scope for quiet objective contemplation and self-observation.

Out of their elaborate self-regard and personal sufficiency, these clever Frenchmen of to-day are like men up against a large opaque body. They can see neither through nor round it. It seems to me that to be invisible to them is proof of one's greatness and universality. The mole cannot see the sun. To be praised by them implies that one is of their nature. Like approves of like. To these confirmed subjectivists (I quote from M. Schmitt) Beethoven is Weberish and Grieg is of the sheep-fold; but our Goossens, Vaughan-Williams, Scott, and Berners (Delijs is also in this galley) are those on whom we should most plume ourselves, not Elgar at all,—it is these who are most conspicuous in the list of our creative musicians and who—had Mr. Ronald been 'inspired'—would have been selected to represent us in Paris. It is in the nature of things that the modern Frenchmen should consider their view the sole view that perceives truth.

We are taught to beseech protection from our friends. I think that our young men of creative genius should very gravely consider the significance of this Parisian judgment on Elgar. It has a mighty lesson for them.—Yours, &c.,

SYDNEY GREW.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

CHARLES GEORGE MARCHANT, organist of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, on January 16. Just sixty-three years ago was born in Dublin of a Huguenot family (yet allied maternally to the family of Robert Emmet) this subsequently distinguished organist and conductor. In 1865 he became a chorister of St. Patrick's Cathedral, and studied under Dr. Frank Robinson. After his voice 'broke' he studied the pianoforte at the Royal Irish Academy of Music under George Sproule, and was appointed organist of Holy Trinity, Rathmines, in April, 1874, becoming organist of Christ Church, Bray, in 1876. The more important appointment at St. Matthias' Church, Adelaide Road, became vacant in May, 1879, and Marchant was appointed to it, but was destined to hold office for only one week, when he was promoted to be organist and choir-master of St. Patrick's Cathedral. He was subsequently appointed conductor of Dublin University Choral Society (founded in 1837), and organist of Trinity College Chapel, as well as professor of the organ at the Royal Irish Academy of Music—all of which appointments he held till his death. He was a brilliant organist, excelling as accompanist, and did good work for full forty years. Dublin University honoured him with a Mus. Doc. degree in 1906. A year ago he was stricken with influenza, followed by complications, and continued an invalid till death summoned him on January 16. Dr. Marchant was a truly lovable personality.

By the death of HORATIO W. PARKER, on December 18, America has lost one of her most distinguished composers of the older school, and one who exerted a wide and beneficial influence on the development of music in his country. As a composer he won notoriety as a frequent winner of prizes, while retaining the esteem of the discriminating for maintaining his artistic standard. His chief success lay in winning, with his opera 'Mona,' the prize of £2,000 offered by the Metropolitan Opera Company for the best opera by an American composer. In this country he was chiefly known as the composer of 'Hora Novissima,' a sacred cantata produced at the Chester Festival of 1899, and performed again at Worcester in 1902. The work, which bears the sub-title 'The rhythm of Bernard de Morlaix on the Celestial Country,' attracted a good deal of attention at the time, and is still performed on occasions by English choral Societies. Horatio Parker was born in 1863; he studied at Boston and afterwards under Rheinberger and Abel at Munich. He took up several important posts as organist, and in 1894 was appointed professor of music at Yale University.

REGINALD DE KOVEN, a distinguished American composer, on January 15. Born at Middletown, Conn., on April 3, 1859, the son of a distinguished Protestant divine, he received a high-class education, pursuing his final literary and classical course at St. John's College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1879. In the interval he had studied music at Stuttgart, Frankfurt, Vienna, Florence, and Paris, and had the advantage of lessons from Vanuccini, Genée, and Délibes, and he returned to America in 1881. His light operas, including 'Robin Hood,' 'The Begum,' 'Don Quixote,' and others, had an enormous vogue, whilst his single songs were sold by the thousand. Of the latter, 'Oh, promise me,' can boast of a phenomenal popularity, fully a million copies having been sold. Reginald de Koven died with tragic suddenness, whilst receiving the congratulations of a friend on a recent musical success.

MADAME CLARA SAMUELL (Mrs. Henry Rose), the well-known soprano vocalist and singing teacher, on January 9, at the age of sixty-one. Clara Samuell was born at Manchester, where she started her musical education, afterwards studying at Milan. Winning the Parepa Rosa Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music, she became a pupil of Alberto Randegger. Her concert career, which began in 1880, was continuously successful. As a Fellow of the Royal Academy of Music she took up the work of teaching which in late years added to the esteem in which she was held by the musical profession.

WILLIAM CARY BLISS, aged fifty-four, organist and choirmaster at Romsey Abbey from 1888 to 1899, and subsequently at St. Mary's, Otlands Park, and Chertsey Parish Church. He was an excellent player, having been a pupil of Sir Walter Parratt at the Royal College of Music. If a personal note may be allowed, the Editor of this journal would wish to express his deep regret at the death of one who gave him his first lessons and had remained a close friend for thirty years.

MAUD POWELL, a distinguished American violinist. She died practically in harness, having been seized with fatal illness while playing at a concert. Miss Powell was trained at Prague, and had several successful tours in England and on the Continent. She was the soloist at the Philharmonic Concert in London on June 20, 1901, the concert at which Elgar's 'Cockaigne' was played for the first time.

The death is announced at Cannes, in her fifty-ninth year, of MARIE VAN ZANDT, at one time a prima donna of world-wide fame, especially as the original interpreter of the rôle of Lakmé when Délibes's opera was performed at Paris in 1883. She was born in New York.

JOHN HUMPHREYS, on December 17, at the age of sixty-two, for several years bass at the American Episcopal Church, Paris.

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of February, 1860 :

WANTED by a Christian Youth, who has a decided musical talent, an engagement as ASSISTANT to a Composer of Music, or in any other capacity in which his knowledge of musical science and art could be further enlarged and made available in the services of a professional gentleman or otherwise. In any case he would throw his whole youthful energies into his favourite pursuit. Address A. B., Mr. G. R. Day's, Commercial-street (N.E.)

TO BE SOLD for £15, a perfect gem of a small FINGER ORGAN, $4\frac{1}{2}$ octaves; containing 4 stops, 2 diapasons, principal, and fifteenth; in neat mahogany case, with gilt pipes in front, &c. Apply to Mr. J. Onions, Market-place, Wolverhampton.

NELLY GRAY, by BALFE.—The only song of this name sung by the Christy Minstrels is the copyright of Boosey and Sons. Certain music-sellers having advertised an American song with the same title, the public is requested to order "Balfe's Nelly Gray," to avoid mistakes. It is also arranged for Pianoforte by BRINLEY RICHARDS, price 3s.; and as a Valse by LAURENT, price 3s. Boosey and Sons, Holles-street.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—The first Conversation of the season was given on Wednesday evening, the 18th of January, in St. James's Hall, when between seven and eight hundred persons were present. The hall was fitted up with great magnificence, as on the former conversation, under the management of the secretary, Mr. Charles Salaman, who deserves the highest praise for his exertions. There were exhibited among other things, some rare and antique musical instruments, manuscripts, and articles of virtu, together with many valuable and curious oil-paintings and water-colours. In the course of the evening, several pieces of music were performed by various professional and non-professional members of the society. . . . The hall presented a splendid appearance, the ladies and gentlemen being costumed as for the ball-room; and the whole affair passed off with exceeding brilliancy, constituting a most admirable inauguration to the season.

CLEOFANTE CAMPANINI

Cleofante Campanini disappears from the world's stage after many years of eminently successful artistic activity. He was not one of the greatest conductors of his time, but undoubtedly he had qualities that fully entitled him to sustain the distinguished rôle he was called upon to play. He inherited the traditions of Verdi's early favourite Franco-Faccio, but like all heirs he was handicapped to some extent by not having to encounter initial difficulties or taste the unripe fruit of inexperience. Possessing all the characteristics of nature's musicians, he lacked only the power of searching self-criticism which would have made him a man of genius. It is rather singular that while his death has been recorded by the obituaries of most English and American journals, in Italy it was almost unnoticed by the great dailies. Of course in Italy at the moment newspaper readers get little else beyond Fiume and the political situation. Yet the fact remains that he was on the whole better known abroad than in the country of his birth.

He had his day in Italy too, but while he was making himself known and appreciated in foreign tours there grew up at home a school of conductors which in many ways was bound to oust Campanini from the first place, and although he always had his faithful admirers his name is not associated with the more important events of musical Italy during the last thirty years. Edoardo Mascheroni, who first conducted 'Falstaff'; Rodolfo Ferrari, who first introduced the realists, Mascagni, Leoncavallo, &c., to Continental Europe; Vittorio Vanzo, who made a speciality of Wagner; and, above all, Arturo Toscanini, who made his own every score that he interpreted—all were bound to efface the memory of Campanini's achievements. It may seem but a short time since Campanini was leading the Covent Garden forces, yet he belonged artistically to a generation that is no more. He was adaptable enough, but his insight into modern music was more the outcome of an essentially musical temperament than innate sympathy. Wagner was little known to the Italy from which he sprung, and, if to-day the attraction of Wagner cannot be said to show signs of diminishing, we do not any longer turn to Leipsic for the latest fashions in music. It was to his power to adapt himself to new circumstances that Campanini owed much of his success abroad. The different conditions existing in England and America were never a hindrance to him. He was able to do his best under all circumstances, and if his readings had not the finish and the individual magnetism of a Toscanini performance, they were always perfectly adequate. Campanini took a genuine interest in the new music, and did his best for young composers. There will be some perhaps whose experience may lead them to challenge this statement. It should be remembered, however, that even the most enlightened Mæcenæ is not necessarily without prejudices. Campanini, who had seen the rise of a few and the eclipse of so many, was naturally inclined to trust a good deal to his own experience and not likely to take composers at their own valuation. However well intentioned the patron, and no matter how catholic his tastes may be, the path of the innovator is bound to be difficult. Campanini did his best to discover new men—that is as much as one has the right to expect from anyone.

LUIGI ILLICA

The author of many excellent opera libretti like 'Bòhème' and 'Iris,' Luigi Illica, who died last month at his villa at Castellarquato, was in many ways one of the most striking personalities in Italian artistic life. Few know when they witness the first Act of 'La Bòhème' that Luigi Illica had actually lived the life he describes. He came to Milan in his young days as poor as a church mouse and took lodgings with a cobbler. During a bitter winter he actually burnt his landlord's lasts surreptitiously to keep himself warm. He also developed the habit of borrowing money from the cobbler, and when the thing had gone too far, and neither debtor nor creditor was sure of what the reckoning really should be, Illica proposed in the best Marcello style promissory notes for each new advance. Thus he signed notes for sixpence and a shilling which were duly honoured when at last fortune changed. He also frequented a little café (not perhaps unlike the 'Momus' establishment in 'Bòhème') where statesmanship and politics were loudly discussed. Illica, who was an enthusiast and a man of advanced views, got himself into trouble and fought a duel from which he emerged minus half an ear. But he was a good fellow and a good patriot. When the war broke out he at once joined up in spite of his sixty years, and served for a time at the front as a corporal of artillery. Playing many parts in life, he started a newspaper which had small success, and wrote comedies and dramas that failed with the exception of one, in which a not easy critic found much to praise. But Illica's day came when, along with Giacosa, he planned his first libretto. He had found himself at last, and produced in a short space of time 'Andrea Chenier' for Giordano, 'Bohème,' 'Tosca,' and 'Butterfly' for Puccini, 'Isabeau' and 'Iris' for Mascagni. And it is as a librettist of the most popular Italian operas of his time that Illica will be remembered. A man of his temperament was bound to make enemies, but he had also many staunch friends who saw beneath his oddities and waywardness the sterling worth and child-like simplicity of the man.

MUSICAL CRIES OF LONDON IN SHAKESPEARE'S TIME

The announcement of a paper on the above subject by Sir Frederick Bridge drew a crowded audience at the Musical Association meeting on December 2. The lecturer said that, according to Dr. Wheatley, the cries in the streets in Shakespeare's time were much the same as those recorded in the 15th century. Musical historians told us very little of these cries, but fortunately a complete collection of them had been preserved to us in the works of three great musicians who were contemporaries of Shakespeare—Weelkes, Gibbons, and Dering. These had not been printed, but the MSS. were in the British Museum. They were not set to a musical accompaniment, but incorporated words and music in a new form of composition for voices and instruments, an enlargement of the Fancy, the vocal parts consisting exclusively of the cries. That the cries were given to the original music was proved by the fact that all three composers used the same words and music for similar cries. In the three Fancies there were nearly a hundred and fifty different cries and itinerant vendors' songs.

The specimen by Weelkes was the shortest and least elaborate, the cries being allotted to one part only. In the middle was a charming little dance-tune, and the piece concluded with an Alleluia which sounded rather like an anthem. It was interesting to find that the Gibbons example was in the form of an 'In nomine,' i.e., written round a plainsong melody. The opening was very picturesque. It suggested a quiet street in the very early morning, when the monotone of the watchman was heard going his round, 'God give you good-morrow, my masters; past three o'clock and a faire morning.' Then suddenly the cries of the vendors of fish began, followed by others, until at length the work concluded with the watchman's warning, 'Twelve o'clock, Look well to your lock, Your fire and your light, And so good-night.' The Dering work was called 'What d'ye lacke?'—after the opening which was clearly intended to represent the 'prentices at the shop doors advertising their wares. The great charm of Dering's work was the number of real songs—i.e., more than cries—which he had preserved for us. It was an advance on Gibbons and Weelkes, and showed Dering to be a really admirable composer. It was astounding how this great man should have been so long neglected by musicians and by historians.

The lecture was illustrated by performances of the three Fancies dealt with, the executants including, amongst others, Miss Coral Peachey, Mr. Stanley Roper, Mr. Graham Smart, Dr. J. C. Bridge, and Mr. W. W. Cobbett.

The London Chamber Concert Society announces a season of ten concerts at Wigmore Hall, to be held on Tuesdays from February 3 to April 20 (March 30 and April 6 omitted). The new works for presentation are a String Quartet by Arnold Bax, and a Violin Sonata by Ruby Holland. Other features of interest are Schubert's Octet, Ravel's Septet, Dr. Smyth's 'Chrysilla,' and Elgar's Quartet, Quintet, and Violin Sonata, played by Messrs. Sammons, Reed, Jeremy, Salmond, and Murdoch.

DALCROZE EURHYTHMICS

A long period has elapsed since the founder of Dalcroze Eurhythmics last gave personal superintendence to their propagation in this country. Meanwhile the Dalcroze Society of Great Britain and Ireland has been active, and the number of adherents and critics of the movement has continually increased until the Dalcroze system now counts as a substantial force in musical education. Great interest was therefore roused by the announcement that M. Jaques-Dalcroze would again visit England to conduct a series of demonstrations. The meeting which we attended at the Lyceum Theatre on the morning of January 17 brought together a large gathering of interested spectators. A group of young women—the finished product of Eurhythmics—were put through exercises of a type which can now be written down as familiar, their purpose being to exhibit freedom in translating musical elements into rhythmic bodily movement, and easy, spontaneous expression of musicianship by voice or at the pianoforte. The importance given in these exercises to improvisatory methods has been objected to as tending to bar the students from a proper acquaintance with musical literature. But it seemed to us that the pedagogic value of the demonstration was more obvious when it revealed the steps toward musical aptitude and ready self-expression than when it made a display of prepared results. Some studied interpretations in the Dalcroze fashion appealed as a spectacle but did not help educationists in the audience to examine the musical perception of the students or how it was built up. Those who came as strangers to the system might easily have been misled by the apparently spectacular aims of the Dalcroze teaching, and might not realise that the practice of movement as a guide to musical instinct and expression in no way implies an audience to witness it. M. Dalcroze pointed out the danger of this misconception, but perhaps with too little insistence in view of the surroundings. M.

MUSICAL APPRECIATION: A THEORY

BY LEONARD G. GABRIEL

There are few sufficiently interested in all arts to cause them to reflect upon them from a comparative standpoint. But to any such, one thing must become immediately evident—that music stands on a rather different basis from that of its sisters. The painter perceives his subject either with his sight-organs or in the realms of his imagination; his function as a painter consists in transferring his perceptions to canvas in such a way that their beauty may become evident to any who may see his work. With the composer it is different: all that he can transfer to paper is a sort of very hard, matter-of-fact synopsis of the workings of his thought-centres. For the conveyance of his ideas to an audience he must trust, in the vast majority of cases, to an executant who has as his sole guide the cryptic shorthand-note which is the only record the composer has been able to make of his original mood or mind-working. It will thus be seen how very important is the function of the executive artist, whether vocalist or instrumentalist.

Let us examine briefly this function. Above all, his technical powers must be equal to all demands which may be classed under the heading 'mechanical.' Secondly, he must be able to appreciate within a little the ideas in the mind of the composer when he wrote the piece. But does this constitute all the necessary equipment of an artist who is able to fill the biggest hall with an enraptured audience? Obviously not; for if so, there would be nothing to explain why every artist could not do the same, for it cannot be denied that most of them possess in quite a high degree the afore-mentioned powers. No: Paderewski and Melba do not rise or fall merely by a chance wind; they have some attribute which the less-famed artists have not. This quality is, in my view, the ability to establish rapport between themselves and the audience. I do not like the term 'rapport,' suggestive as it is of Spiritualism and such other mystic subjects; but, nevertheless, it seems to be the most suitable to be found.

Of course, this view necessarily involves several assumptions. First, we may doubt whether such a thing as a relation between the mind of a performer and that of a member of the audience can exist at all. However, in the light of recent psychological investigations I do not think that its possibility can be really seriously doubted. Then, again, we must assume that it is possible to play or sing the same succession of notes in two different manners, indistinguishable (or practically so) from the purely mechanical and materialistic point of view, but nevertheless producing a different effect on the minds of the hearers. This is admittedly a much more debatable point, but I think that after due consideration it will have to be conceded. Any who have heard Mr. Plunket Greene sing certain songs, and have heard them shortly afterwards from other vocalists (often with great reputations), will easily see what I have in mind. To take one instance: who can avoid a shiver when Mr. Greene sings Lidgey's 'The Widow Bird'? Yet I have heard one of our best-known concert vocalists sing the song in a style 'mechanically' indistinguishable from that of Mr. Greene, but without evoking any response from the audience, most of whom appeared to be admiring the ceiling decorations, with their attention anywhere but on the singer.

The methods of securing such rapprochement—assuming its existence to be established—would form an interesting piece of psychological research. Much obviously comes under the heading of 'personality.' Anything in the actions or appearance of the executant which appeals to the emotions of the audience, at once creates a receptive field for the thought waves of the brain which controls the execution of the music. One great asset of a performer would, on this view, be a genial manner; and who can doubt that such is not the case? Of course, it must be noted that such externals only help to establish the rapprochement, which is really a connection of minds. Neither should we forget that in many cases the audience is not naturally unresponsive. Here we see the influence of a reputation already made elsewhere. The mere fact that others have found the particular artist good, concentrates the attentive powers of the audience, and again creates a fertile field for any seed that may be sown.

Turning from the solo performer to a collection of performers, it will be interesting to see how the theory applies in the case of, say, orchestras and choruses. I am inclined to think that the conductor functions as a sort of focus for attention, and the advent of virtuoso conductors has done much to confirm this view. These conductors often take on concertos with orchestras other than their own, and secure appreciably better results than the local men, although they have certainly not had time to improve any of the mechanical details of performance. Of course, here the influence of reputation is clearly demonstrated. Also we may mention another fact—the difficulty of comprehension of the concerto. Even with the eyes closed it is not easy to avoid conceiving the work as dual in character. May not this be due to the fact that two minds are, as it were, appealing to the audience, and that, as often as not, interference ensues between the two sets of thought-radiations?

Such are a few aspects of this theory, which is in accordance with modern psychological thought, and goes far to explain many facts of interest in the matter of public appreciation of music. Nothing that I have yet come across can be adduced as evidence against it, and indeed the chief weakness of it seems to be, that it explains, if anything, too much. However, I do not claim to have given here a rigid and complete exposition. If I have suggested a line of interesting and profitable thought to audiences or performers, I shall have achieved my object.

TRADITION AND THE OPERA

BY WILLIAM BEESON

The many excellent articles upon the operatic art-form that have appeared in various journals of late would seem to approach this subject as though it were suffering from some little functional ailment, whereas the truth is that opera is diseased, and diseased to such an extent that only the surgeon's knife can raise in us any hope of a cure.

The opinion of one well-known operatic impresario, namely, that opera's deplorable condition to-day is due to the apathy of the general Press towards it, is perhaps near the mark, but the Press might easily be pardoned for cold-shouldering an art-form that requires so much advertising and support to make it successful.

The fact is that apart from criticism, or the lack of it, opera has a few sins of its own to answer for and put right. I saw 'Faust' fifteen years ago, and at a recent production the same old stage setting was used and there was the same old incompetent chorus. Tradition grasps opera to-day in its bony claws, and dresses and stages it with commonplace tawdriness, slavish in its adherence to the hoary past. Nor is it fair to the general public to assert that the success of operas like 'Cavalleria' or 'Pagliacci' is built upon a single tune. No single tune would in itself popularise an opera. One can be bored by the first Act of 'Tristan' but never by 'Pagliacci,' and yet after three weeks with Puccini, Mascagni, and others of the same superficial school we return to Wagner with a love as firm and generous as ever, only to be bored again in turn.

Nor can we fall back upon drama for guidance in our search for the disease. A comparison between drama and opera is out of the question, because music as an explanatory force is simply not in it with the actor who can tell his dog (and incidentally the audience) how matters stand when the curtain rises upon the play or the various Acts.

The Puccini-Leoncavallo school in spite of its cheap and pretty tunes grasped this elementary fact, and even if it did not solve the problem to the satisfaction of our musical senses at least stepped neatly over the holes in its stories instead of taking a running jump or building a cumbrous bridge to obtain the same result.

Equally futile would be any attempt to educate our singers to the level of dramatic art as we have it upon the legitimate stage. For one thing the singing and the dramatic temperaments do not work harmoniously together. The moment a singer attains to super-excellence of acting, then as certain is that singer to deteriorate on the purely vocal side. I hasten to explain that I am not thinking of mere tone deterioration, but the coloratura and the convincing naturalness and ease necessary in the delivery of a difficult singing part.

For many years opera has sinned deeply in the matter of chorus, and only of late years has any attempt been made to infuse into it younger blood and at least a certain level of competence. The principals too: how few of them realise that they have constantly before them a capable musical medium in the form of the orchestra thoroughly able to do its own work and thus leave the singers free to give us what they frequently fail to do—a dramatic diction which, if not always understandable in mere words, shall leave us in no doubt as to its intent.

Who has not been bored to apathy by the stationary ship in 'Tristan,' and wondered why some well-known musical comedy producer has not been given a free hand to introduce some movement into it to help poor Isolde during her trying hour. And why do we not scrap the sickly sentimental Elizabeth's Prayer? Sir Thomas Beecham did give us an up to date setting of 'Le Coq d'Or' and a young and attractive ballet in 'Faust,' but there the spasmodic effort seemed to end.

There is of course no doubt that musical criticism (the competent thing as we know it to-day) can do much for opera in conjunction with a sympathetic Press, but opera must also help itself, and in this respect it cannot do better than make a start towards shedding its own hidebound tradition.

HOW TO CUT A PLAYER-PIANO RECORD

BY EDWARD W. GREGORY

I listened to a fantasia played on a player-piano by a friend who asked me if I had ever heard it before. 'No,' I replied, 'it is new to me.' 'No wonder,' he said, 'I composed it myself and cut the roll myself. It is 200-ft. long, and, as you have heard, it takes eight minutes to run through.'

As my friend has no executive skill whatever, I supposed he must first have written the piece, got an expert pianist to play it over on the pianoforte, and employed some cunning device to mark out the notes as they were played, on a plain roll of paper, afterwards simply cutting the holes thus marked. But it was not so. He had written the piece first, and translated it into roll form before it was actually played. And he said it was a very fair translation. It certainly sounded very pleasing. But I am no musician, though I am proud of my friend and his patience and accomplishment. There may be others who would like to try.

The first thing, obviously, is to write the music, which need only be put down in diagrammatic or skeleton form. Then a roll of unperforated paper must be obtained, and for this my friend acknowledges the courtesy of a player-piano Company who permitted him to buy one from them.

A drawing-board is needed, at the top of which two small brackets with slots must be fixed to hold the roll. At the bottom is a roller to take the paper as the work proceeds. A T-square, sliding up and down the board, is used to mark horizontal lines across the roll. A scale, exactly the width of the roll (11 $\frac{3}{4}$ -in.) is carefully marked out into sixty-five divisions, to correspond with the notes of a 65-note player, the distance from centre to centre of each division being $\frac{1}{2}$ -in. This gives five and a-half octaves.

Decide upon the speed at which the music is to be played. If the tempo is to be that of an average march, each crotchet will be represented by a perforated hole 1-in. long by $\frac{1}{2}$ -in. wide. This will make 4 inches to the bar. Therefore you will divide the roll with horizontal pencil lines ruled across 1-in. apart.

It would appear that now the translation of the notes of the manuscript into the holes of the roll would be merely a mechanical affair. But experience shows that the length of a perforation, representing a note of a particular denomination—say a crotchet—will vary according to its expressive value, and it is the careful judgment of the required length that prevents the cutting from being merely a tiresome job. For instance, the length of a paused note is very much longer than is generally supposed. A paused crotchet may have to be represented by a perforation 4-in. long, or the result would be too staccato.

Four steel punches are required, each $\frac{3}{32}$ -in. wide. The first will be circular, the others $\frac{1}{4}$ -in., $\frac{1}{2}$ -in., and $\frac{3}{4}$ -in. long. They are the sort a saddler uses to punch holes and slots in straps. Longer holes than are possible with these must be cut with a sharp knife and a parallel ruler, the ends of the holes being first made with the round punch and the intervening length cut out. You cannot punch or cut on the drawing-board. It is not sufficiently rigid. After two or three feet of the roll have been pencilled out, the holes must be punched by laying the paper on a heavy stone with a sheet of motor fibre on top, and the punch tapped with a light hammer. The cutting of the long notes must be done on a sheet of glass. Mistakes may be corrected with gummed paper. Absolute accuracy is essential. Although the process sounds complicated, the cutting of a roll can, after practice, be done at about the same speed as making a fair copy of a piece of music in manuscript. My friend completed the marking and cutting of his 200-ft. roll in about a couple of months, working at odd times of an hour or two a day.

BRITISH MUSIC SOCIETY

On January 10, Dr. R. R. Terry lectured at Newcastle-on-Tyne on 'The Masses of William Byrd.' There was a good attendance in spite of the stormy weather. The lecturer made play with the prevalent ignorance concerning our own great composers as contrasted with a general familiarity with the works of Continental masters. The Elizabethan period was, he said, as brilliant in music as it was in literature. Most modern devices had their roots in the English madrigals, and the works of these old composers must be listened to in the spirit of the age in which they were written. We did not, said Dr. Terry, look for the idioms of the 20th century in Dante and Chaucer, and so should not expect to find current usage in the music of an age remote from our own. One of the greatest difficulties in the way of appreciating the polyphonic writers, was our obsession with the 'four in a bar' feeling. Byrd and his contemporaries used cross-rhythms very freely, each part being quite independent of the others with regard to accent. We must not look for the melody being always on top, with the lower parts merely filling in harmonies, but listen for points of melodic interest in all the parts, the uppermost voice being, in its turn, subordinate. Our great heritage should be a source of national pride, and it was for us to see that it no longer lay neglected.

Illustrations from Byrd's four-part Mass were sung by a small choir from the Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union, and from the five-part Mass by a few members of the Bach Choir, both conducted by Mr. W. G. Whittaker.

Music in the Provinces

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS)

BELFAST

Two excellent performances of 'Messiah' given by the Philharmonic Society to overflowing houses took place on December 19 and 20. Mr. E. Godfrey Brown conducted. The artists were Miss Laura Evans Williams, Miss Helen Anderton, Mr. John Vine, and Captain Horace Stevens.

BIRMINGHAM

Among the events precluded from notice in the January Musical Times, the most important was the inauguration of an attractive series of orchestral concerts under Mr. Matthew Stevenson. This occurred at the Town Hall on December 11. The orchestra of the New Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Stevenson's direction, gave the 'Tannhäuser' Overture and 'Venusberg' music, and the Prelude to the 'Dream of Gerontius.' The Russian tenor, M. Mischa-Leon, created a marked impression, immediately establishing his fame at Birmingham. Pianoforte solos were given by Mr. Michael Mullinar, and recitations by Miss Lena Ashwell.

The second concert of the season promoted by the Wassell Concert Society, given at the Town Hall on December 13, was purely orchestral, an excellent programme being provided by Mr. Richard Wassell, who conducted. The chief item was Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, a crucial test for a rank and file which included some amateurs. The novelty of the programme was a set of orchestral variations on two of William Byrd's old-world themes, arranged from the collection of clavier pieces known as the 'Fitzwilliam Virginal Book.' Mr. Bernard Jackson is an earnest musician, and in his erudite orchestral version of these two Byrd examples he showed inventive orchestral colouring of no mean order. Miss Una Truman, a pianist new to Birmingham, created an excellent impression with her intelligent and quite masterly performance of Arensky's Pianoforte Concerto, Op. 2. Elgar's 'Carillon' was played by the orchestra, additional attraction being given by Madame Katrina Lund's graphic recitation of Cammaerts's poem.

Mr. Sidney Stoddard gave another Sunday Concert at the Town Hall on December 14, in aid of the National Institute for the Blind. It was but poorly attended, although the musical items were of more than ordinary attractiveness. Part-songs were sung with notable tone-power, along with expression and artistic phrasing, by the Wolseley Male-Voice Choir, so efficiently trained and conducted by Mr. W. E. Robinson. A pleasing selection of songs was given by Miss Vera Horton, Miss Gwendoline Howes, and Mr. Robert Radford. Mr. Michael Mullinar was the solo pianist.

The customary terminal concert in connection with the Midland Institute School of Music took place in the large Lecture Theatre on December 15, under the direction of Prof. Granville Bantock. The students' orchestra provided an excellently-arranged programme of music, and marked progress was revealed in the playing of the orchestra, probably the best and most finished yet given by the orchestral class. Prof. Bantock had evidently spared no pains in the preparation of the works heard, which comprised Beethoven's Symphony in D, examples from Borodin's 'Prince Igor,' and a Prelude, Scene, and Finale from Roussel's 'Le Marchand de Sable qui passe,' (music written to a little play by G. Jean-Aubry) and Sibelius's Romance in C for strings.

A remarkably impressive pianoforte and vocal recital was given the same evening at the Royal Society of Artists' Gallery by Messrs. Wilfred Ridgway and Arthur Cranmer. The former, a splendidly equipped pianist, played four Etudes by Scriabin, Glazounov's Sonata, Op. 75, and a Chopin selection, and Mr. Cranmer's full and beautiful baritone voice was heard to great advantage in a copious selection of songs by Tchaikovsky, Somerville, and Roger Quilter. The accompanist was Mr. Michael Mullinar.

The second concert of the season of the Birmingham String Quartet was held at the Royal Society of Artists' Gallery on December 18. In the place of quartet music the programme contained Tchaikovsky's great Trio for pianoforte, violin, and 'cello, Op. 80, in A minor, John Ireland's Sonata in A major, and No. 1 in D minor, and Böellmann's Sonata in A minor for 'cello and pianoforte. Mr. Michael Mullinar, an exceptionally fine pianist, had the lion's share in this concert, assisting throughout the programme with great distinction. In the Trio he had for coadjutors Mr. Percival Hodgson (violin) and Miss Joan Willis (violoncello).

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society's sixty-fourth annual Yule-tide performance of 'Messiah' took place in the Town Hall on Boxing Night. This concert is a popular event that is always anticipated with keen appreciation. Sir Henry Wood did wonders with choir and orchestra, imparting to the great oratorio a nobility and grandeur rarely attained—indeed, his forces surpassed themselves. Tone-quality and power, firmness of attack and ensemble, along with graphic phrasing, were observed throughout. Mr. C. W. Perkins was at his customary place at the organ, where he rendered valuable assistance. The solo singers were Miss Olive Sturgess, Miss Doris Manuelle, Mr. Walter Hyde, and Mr. Norman Allin.

In the Town Hall, on January 1, the famous Glasgow Orpheus Choir gave a typical Scottish concert under its gifted conductor, Mr. Hugh S. Robertson, in aid of Sir Harry Lauder's fund for Scottish Sailors and Soldiers. Considering the crowded attendance the fund will no doubt be greatly benefited. The truly fine singing of this magnificently trained choir in an admirable selection of Scottish part-songs constituted a musical treat of the highest order. Greatly appreciated, too, were the songs contributed by Miss Boyd Steven and Miss Jenny Macintyre.

The second series of Mr. Appleby Matthews's Sunday Orchestral Concerts was inaugurated on January 4, and will be carried on right up to the end of the season. The venue, the Futurist Cinema Theatre, was again crowded to excess as usual. The concert itself ranks as the best he has given since the beginning of the concerts, on September 7 last. The programme will speak for itself, for it included Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony, Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll,' and Elgar's beautiful Sonata for pianoforte and violin, the latter being most nobly interpreted by Mr. Matthews and Mr. Alex. Cohen. It was by far the finest of the three performances yet heard at Birmingham. Mr. Appleby Matthews is indeed to be congratulated on the way he has directed these artistic and educational orchestral concerts.

At the third Quinlan Subscription Concert, given at the Town Hall on January 6, Madame Kirkby Lunn and Mr. Leonard Borwick appeared in place of Miss Muriel Foster and M. Godowsky, their artistic efforts meeting with the utmost appreciation. Owing to the great success achieved by Madame Renée Chemet, the accomplished French violinist, in October last, she was re-engaged for this concert, and again proved a centre of attraction, her glorious art asserting itself in a manner that enchanted her listeners. Mr. Clarence Whitehill's distinguished style and phrasing also added to the interest of the occasion. Mr. Harold Craxton was as usual a reliable and artistic accompanist.

Mozart's String Quintet in G minor and Tanéïev's String Quintet, Op. 16, in C, were given by the Catterall combination at their third chamber concert of the current season at the Royal Society of Artists' Gallery on January 13. Their performance was distinguished by the unanimity, artistic finish, and nobility of expression for which this splendid combination of artists is famed. Mr. Paul Beard was the second viola.

BOURNEMOUTH

The usual activity in matters musical at Bournemouth has been maintained since last month's résumé of the Symphony Concerts appeared in these columns, many new works having been introduced into the programmes. So far as the central pieces—the symphonies—are concerned, there has been no discovery of any as yet unheard masterpiece; but such a capture, under the prevailing tendencies in musical composition, when composers are revealing a decided disinclination to address themselves to the old symphonic form, is not likely to eventuate with much frequency.

Perhaps the most successful all-round performance of the recent concerts was that of Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Scheherazade.' It requires a continuous effort of more than ordinary proportions to sustain the sum-total of the highly-strung emotions of this suite from the first bar to the last. Mr. Dan Godfrey and his Orchestra were, however, certainly keenly receptive to its changeful moods on this particular occasion, giving us an interpretation that, for passionate forcefulness and melting tenderness, has never been surpassed at Bournemouth. Another work in which both conductor and instrumentalists especially shone was Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture, in which the playing was equally impassioned.

Much enjoyment was derived from the first performance here of Arthur Somervell's 'Normandy' Variations for pianoforte and orchestra. It is a musicianly composition, alike scholarly in construction and appealing in expression. The music would however benefit from greater diversity and contrast. Dr. Somervell conducted the work very resourcefully, but he did not receive quite the necessary co-operation at the hands of the soloist, Miss Jessie Munro.

Other novelties, in addition to the above, were: Howard Carr's 'The Jovial Huntsmen,' Paul N. Kerby's Overture to 'As You Like It,' Ernest Austin's 'Stella-Mary' Dances, and Theme and Derivations for String Orchestra by Capt. A. Becket Williams. Of these, the first-named will probably prove to have the most enduring qualities, though it is not an entirely successful piece of writing. Its cleverness is immediately discernible, but for a humorous subject the music is too weighty in substance. Mr. Kerby's clever Shakespearian overture is far more appropriately fashioned, although the composer has not yet acquired so much individuality of utterance as is in the equipment of Mr. Carr. The two remaining works did not prove very striking; in both, however, there were some features of merit.

We must pass over other works of interest at these concerts, merely recording them without comment. They were as follows: Glazounov's sixth Symphony, Beethoven's 'Eroica' and C minor Symphonies, Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic,' Mozart's 'Prague' Symphony, Dvorák's 'Carnival' Overture, Wagner's 'Mastersingers' Overture, and Debussy's 'L'Après-Midi d'un Faune.'

Of the soloists, we have already mentioned Miss Munro's association with the production of the 'Normandy' Variations. Then we have had a performance of Max Bruch's rather dreary 'Kol Nidrei' for violoncello and orchestra by a leading member of the Municipal band, Mr. Hend Wolters, who played the music with much charm of expression. At the Christmas week concert, Mr. Joseph Coleman, quite a youthful violinist, made an excellent impression in Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' showing every promise of developing into a sterling performer. On New Year's Day, Mr. York Bowen presented his own Fantasia (Concerto No. 3) for pianoforte and orchestra, an extremely vivacious and effective composition, which he played in brilliant and engaging style. The following week Miss Gertrude Ramsden, a young student well-known in local circles, was heard to advantage in the Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for Violin and Orchestra by Saint-Saëns. Miss Ramsden is a performer whose future career will be watched with interest.

BRISTOL

Vigorous work was put in by the local Choral Societies last month, and evidently the work of post-war reconstruction is proceeding apace at Bristol. But it is to be hoped that we shall have some new compositions in the coming season.

Under Mr. A. E. Gough, a choir of about sixty voices gave an excellent performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' Parts 1 and 2, in Cotham Wesleyan Chapel Schoolroom on December 12. Their intonation, power, and animation were notable in the chorus work. The success of the evening was heightened by the contributions of Miss Eva Hartshorn, a soprano well-known to Bristol, Mr. Seymour Dosser, whose 'Onaway, awake' was warmly applauded, and Mr. W. Vernon Noble, in the baritone solos. Miss Kitty Newton, at the pianoforte, added much to the artistic success of the occasion, being heard also in César Franck's Prelude, Choral and Fugue.

Oldland, an offshoot of Bristol, has a vigorous and enterprising Choral Society, just recently formed, and at the Village Hall on December 13 these singers gave their first concert to a full house. The Society is recruited from the various choirs in the district, and is a link in that chain of choral singing that attains its consummation in the great choral societies of Bristol. The seventy voices taking part in this inaugural concert were not all uninitiated, and put their first-hand knowledge to very good use under Mr. W. Vaughan Jenkins, a painstaking conductor. The programme comprised a number of choruses from 'Messiah,' a very wise first concert selection, which were sung with such spontaneity, and such close attention to attack and release and regard for chiaroscuro, as completely to capture the audience. A small but efficient string orchestra accompanied. Miss Hilda Stowar, Miss May Keene, Mr. G. E. Lewton, and Mr. T. J. Glyn Eastman gave admirable presentations of the solo numbers. Mr. George Riseley, several of whose pupils were in the choir, was present and heartily congratulated the Society on so favourable a beginning. Mr. Riseley has accepted the post of president of the Society. Other items in the programme were supplied by Mr. Fred Wilshire, a delightful humorist, 'partner in law' with Mr. Fred Weatherly, who gave some of his musical sketches at the pianoforte, the choir was heard in several carols and other Christmas music, and Mr. Leonard Dennis (violinello) and the quartet of vocalists contributed solos. Altogether it was a delightful programme as well in design as in execution.

Mr. P. Napier Miles, on December 16, arranged one of the pleasant musical evenings that are a regular feature of Bristol Musical Club, at which Mr. Clive Carey gave three songs from a Fairy Play composed by himself, and Mr. Reginald Paul sympathetically interpreted several pianoforte solos.

The musical energies of Mr. P. Napier Miles also find an outlet at the other end of the city, where the Avonmouth and Shirehampton Choral Society, of which he is conductor, is establishing a vigorous standard of work. These singers gave a truly British programme on December 17, the principal item being Hubert Parry's 'Pied Piper.' The choir showed commendable attention to the conductor's directions. The soloists were Mr. Steuart Wilson and Mr. Clive Carey—who also gave songs and chanties—and the oboe obbligato was played by Mr. Percy Bennett. The choral programme, in addition to the cantata, included P. Napier Miles's 'Christmas Carol' (from 'Westward Ho!'), 'Heraclitus' (Stanford), 'Sweet Nymph' (Thomas Morley), 'Sing all at pleasure' (Weelkes), and Hubert Parry's choral song, 'Jerusalem.' Mr. Reginald Paul, a pianoforte player whose future will be watched with interest, again gave much additional pleasure by a number of solos.

On December 20, Bristol Choral Society gave its annual performance of 'Messiah.' Always a great event locally, every seat was taken days before the performance. It is safe to say the Society has never sung the massive choruses with better effect. Band and choir numbered over five hundred performers. The balance of the choir is quite good again, though there is still a shortage of tenors. The ladies' voices are firm, strong, and pure. Mr. Riseley is getting very fine results once more with his increased resources. The precision was machine-like, the tone round and full, while the greatest attention was paid to expression-marks in the rapid tempo Mr. Riseley always exacts in his readings. The solo parts were sung with customary distinction by Miss Carrie Tubbs, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Norman Allin. Mr. Riseley was as vigorous and uncompromising with the baton at the end of his three hours' work as when he began. What a debt Bristol choral music owes to this veteran conductor!

There was a crowded audience at Colston Hall for a special concert on January 11, arranged by the Amalgamated Musicians' Union and the V.M.C.A. Brotherhood for the benefit of Mr. J. E. Wilkinson's widow. The deceased, who was a fine euphonium player, died suddenly after hurrying to fulfil his engagement at a recent concert at Colston Hall. Mr. George Riseley directed the proceedings, and the Lord Mayor gave an address. Mr. Wilkinson was president of the Union for twenty-one years. Mendelssohn's 'Athalie' Overture and Partridge's Grand Fantasia were among the musical items. About a hundred pounds was realised.

The Church Music Society held an interesting meeting at Bristol Cathedral Chapter House on January 13. The Rev. J. R. W. Thomas, speaking on the objects of the Society, referred to the prevailing discontent with the state of Church music locally, and pointed out the need for a central organization to assist in effecting an improvement. In the course of a discussion it was suggested that more educational lectures should be given, with the assistance of 'travelling' choirs.

Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society, which has stood the test of fifty-eight years' excellent work, gave a concert on December 11, directed by Mr. Edward Cook, the Society's conscientious conductor and a well-known Bristol musician. Mr. Cook was for many years organist of St. Paul's, Clifton. 'Judas Maccabæus' was the oratorio chosen, and despite the lack of tonal balance (the male side of the choir being comparatively weak—thirty voices out of some hundred and thirty), the work was very creditably presented, except where the power of the tenors and basses should have predominated. It is greatly to be hoped the Weston young men of music will rally to the cause now the war is over. The tone of the singers is good, and they showed an intelligent response to the conductor's beat. If Mr. Cook can get his proper quota of voices, the Society should do well. Miss Rébé Hillier, always an appreciated contralto, Miss Ada Forrest (soprano), Mr. Richard Ripley (tenor), and Mr. Harold Williams (an Australian baritone) were the principals, and gained high praise for their work. The orchestra consistently backed the efforts of the choir.

Portishead Choral Society, recently re-started under Mr. Alexander Rawson, gave after short preparation, on December 18, a careful representation of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' and Mendelssohn's 'Loreley' at the Union Hall. Band and choir numbered eighty performers, the former being under the leadership of Miss Catherine Startup. The choral work revealed the marked interest of the singers in the music. Mr. F. H. Wensley was the soloist in 'Hiawatha,' and Miss Elizabeth Morgan the principal singer in 'Loreley.' Mr. Wensley, a local tenor of repute, also sang one of Somerville's song-cycles, 'Songs of Friendship,' and the 'Poet and Peasant' Overture was presented by the band. Gade's 'Crusaders' will be given in the spring.

Taunton Choral Society, at its first concert since 1915, gave a fine performance of Hubert Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean.' The revival of the Society has assembled some hundred and thirty singing members, and there was an orchestra of about thirty, led by Mr. Maurice Alexander, a leading Bristol violinist. Mr. Reginald Ward, a distinguished local organist, was the conductor, whose admirable control of his forces secured a result that was very meritorious. Miss Hilda Blake, of Bath, and Mr. Samuel Mann, of London, were the soloists. They were heard also in the second part of the programme, and the band contributed Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture and Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony. Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on Christmas Carols also received an adequate performance.

CAMBRIDGE

Purcell's opera, 'The Fairy Queen,' will be performed under the direction of Mr. Clive Carey at the New Theatre, Cambridge, on Tuesday, February 10, and the following four nights, with a matinée on Saturday. Dr. Cyril Rootham will conduct.

CORNWALL

At Penryn, on December 18, a newly formed Choral Class, conducted by Mr. F. Coad, gave a good programme of choruses, duets, and quartets.

E. C. Nunn's cantata, 'Everyman,' was sung by Morval Church choir, augmented, on December 18. The impressive music made a strong appeal. Miss Rose Oliver was at the organ.

Goonhavern Church choir was augmented on December 26 to sing carols and anthems, and a quartet of voices sang 'Come where the lilies grow' and 'Spring Song.'

COVENTRY AND DISTRICT

The approach of Christmas showed a slight falling-off in Coventry musical events, although concerts by local organizations were well maintained. The Opera House Sunday Concerts, just before the Festival, included music-makings by Miss Ada Forrest, Mlle. Berthe Bert (a French pianist who collaborated with M. André Mangeot (violin) in a masterly interpretation of the César Franck Sonata), Mr. Herbert Teale (the Yorkshire tenor), Mr. Norman Wilks (pianoforte), and Miss Una Truman, a pianist who is deservedly an established favourite in this locality.

Before the Christmas recess the Armstrong-Siddeley Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Matthew Stevenson, gave a public concert at the works canteen of the Company. The programme included the 'Peer Gynt' Suite, selections from 'La Bohème,' 'Praeludium' (Jarnefeldt), 'Hungarian March' (Berlioz), and other items, and attracted a very large audience. The Armstrong-Siddeley Male-Voice Choir, under Mr. S. J. Wisdom, sang the part-songs with which they won the Earl Shilton Challenge Shield. These included 'Land o' the Leal' (Elliot Button), 'Bold Turpin' (Bridge), and 'Crossing the Plain' (Price). Miss Gertrude Tomalin was successful with her monologues, and the soloist was Mr. Eric Lovell, a fine baritone.

The Coventry Musical Club held its second concert of the season on December 17, the programme including part-songs, ballads, and violin solos.

On the afternoon of Boxing Day, Mr. Walter Hoyle, organist and choirmaster of Coventry Cathedral, gave his customary Bank Holiday organ recital with a programme that included the Intermezzo and Finale from Vierne's third Symphony, and Tertius Noble's Solemn Prelude, 'Gloria Domini.'

On New Year's Day the Coventry Philharmonic Society gave 'Messiah' in the Cathedral. The principals were Miss Eva Rich, Miss Beatrice Batchelor, Mr. William Heseltine, and Mr. Joseph Farrington, all of whom were successful. The work of the chorus only wanted an improved balance and attack to be thoroughly satisfying. A small orchestra supplied the accompaniments, supported by Mr. Walter Hoyle at the organ. Mr. Norman Bright was effective in the trumpet obbligatos.

Miss Helen Henschel sang English and French folk-songs and various negro melodies at the Opera House Concert on January 4, solo numbers being also supplied by Mr. Hubert Marshall Hall and Mr. Michael Mullinar. On the following Sunday, Miss Violet Wenderby was the principal soloist.

On January 10 the Armstrong-Siddeley Orchestra gave another concert at the Parkside canteen, when Mr. Matthew Stevenson again conducted, the programme including the 'Nell Gwyn' Dances (Edward German), Suite 'L'Arlesienne' (Bizet), 'Finlandia' (Sibelius), and Gade's Trio in D for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. Miss Mary Foster was the vocalist.

At Leamington, the Corporation music committee makes the welcome announcement of six special concerts to take place in the Town Hall during the early months of the year. Leading vocal and instrumental soloists have been engaged, and the undertaking will no doubt meet with the great success that attended the series of last winter, when these concerts were inaugurated.

The chief musical activities of the holiday season have been confined to the churches, notably St. Paul's, where selections from well-known oratorios were given on December 30, and at St. Alban's, where Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle' ('St. Cecilia') was sung at the choral Eucharist on January 4. Christmas music, under the direction of Mr. Walter Warren, was as usual a conspicuous feature in the services at St. Peter's Roman Catholic Church.

DARLINGTON AND DISTRICT

The Stockton and Thornaby Choral and Orchestral Society gave its first concert of the season on December 18. The principal choral works were Stanford's 'The Revenge,' and 'Acis and Galatea.' The singing was notable for freshness of tone and firmness of attack, especially in the Handel number. The choral work in 'The Revenge' was less confident, and obviously suffered from a lack of adequate rehearsal. The unaccompanied singing of Noble's fine anthem, 'The souls of the righteous' showed the choir at its best. The orchestra was small but good, and gave adequate performances of Mackenzie's 'Britannia' Overture and Sullivan's 'In Memoriam.' Mr. Webster made his début as conductor on this occasion. Save for a general tendency to hurry the tempi he held his forces well together, securing some admirable readings. There was a large audience.

The thirty-fifth Cleveland and Durham Eisteddfod was held in the Town Hall, Middlesbrough, on New Year's Day. This annual gathering had been suspended during the war, and its resumption was hailed with universal delight. Two public competitions were held, one in the afternoon and the other in the evening, the latter being attended by a large and enthusiastic audience. Mr. E. T. Davies, as adjudicator, gave almost general satisfaction in his allocation of awards. Mr. Arthur Wilson was official accompanist, and Miss Annie Rees solo vocalist. It is hardly necessary to go into details of the programme. The standard was well up to that of previous years, and some remarkably good voices were revealed in the soprano solo section. The fault in most cases was lack of rhythmic power and an obvious ignorance of the dramatic significance of the words. In the instrumental classes, which have always been much too few at this Eisteddfod, the pianists outstripped the violinists both in numbers and technical ability. There was only one entry for the competition for Church choirs, viz., the Victoria Road Choir from Darlington, conducted by Miss Whitfield. The great event was the male-voice choir competition, for which four choirs had entered—Cleveland Harmonic (conducted by Mr. Gavin Kay), Middlesbrough Apollo (Mr. T. Nicholas), Darlington Male-Voice (Mr. G. Holland Fox), and Stockton Lyric (Mr. D. J. Jones). The test-pieces were 'Fallen Heroes,' by Cyril Jenkins, and 'The Winds,' by E. T. Davies. In the result Cleveland Harmonic was first with 81 and 88 marks, the Apollo Choir second with 71 and 76, and the Darlington Choir third with 68 and 73. Stockton Lyric Choir from an unaccountable reason went all to pieces. Of the outstanding merit of the first choir there could be no doubt. Regarding the second and third it seemed a moot point whether the verve and dramatic perception—with, howbeit, occasional lapses of intonation—of the Apollo Choir were preferable to the finely finished, suave performance of the Darlington Choir that, in spite of its correctness, fell short in grip and robustness where these qualities were necessary. Our predilection was rather for the latter, but the adjudicator thought the former had the preference.

DEVONSHIRE

Dr. Ernest Bullock has not wasted any time in making his presence felt at Exeter. Though he assumed his organist's duties at the Cathedral on December 27, he has already issued appeals for a voluntary choir, of church people for the performance of serious music. In this he is following the lead of Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson at Westminster Abbey, and the idea cannot be too strongly commended. The advantageous conditions for training and performances are obvious, and the effect of the study of such works as Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion and Mass in B minor, or Brahms's 'Requiem,' on the musical life of the city will be excellent. Hitherto such works have been outside the scope of local Societies, because their natural element is the Church or Cathedral. This movement of Dr. Bullock's should meet with wide support. At the time of writing about fifty names have been received. Seventy is the goal aimed at, but Dr. Bullock's idea is to enlist quality rather than quantity, and he desires to commence rehearsals at once for a performance of Bach's Passion at the end of March.

Choral Societies have been mainly occupied recently with 'Messiah.' Church choirs at Totnes united under the conductorship of Mr. Herbert Worth in the Parish Church on December 29, and gave selections from the oratorio. Miss E. Hingston played the organ, and with three violinists represented the instrumental part. The choral singing was remarkably good, and the principals were local singers.

The full choir of St. Andrew's Church, Plymouth, including many ladies, gave two performances of 'Messiah' in the Guildhall on January 3, conducted by Mr. H. Moreton. Miss Coral Peachey, Miss Gertrude Winchester, Mr. Frank Webster, and Mr. Joseph Farrington were the principals.

The choir of the Mint Church was augmented on January 7 for the first part of 'Messiah.' Mr. L. H. Holden conducted at the organ, and the principals were Madame Isabel Hickson, Miss L. Harris, Mr. Dean Trotter, and Mr. John Northcote (Barnstaple).

It is gratifying to learn that Plymouth St. Peter's Quartet has been reconstituted after the war with the same personnel—Messrs. A. E. Lintell, R. F. Goldsack, E. G. Horwill, and A. V. Lovell. Mr. E. G. Stoakes succeeds Mr. J. C. Hele as director.

Plymouth Orpheus Choir, conducted by Mr. David Parkes, gave its customary Boxing Day concert in the Guildhall, assisted by Miss Elsie Cochrane and Mr. Robert Heyner. Mr. H. C. Tonking gave, among other organ solos, a remarkably dramatic reading of Sibelius's 'Finlandia' tone-poem. The choral singing attained, as always, a high artistic standard. Jenkins's 'Fallen Heroes' and 'The Assyrian came down,' and Prothero's 'Invictus,' were among the selections.

Exeter Oratorio Society has fixed May 5 for the inauguration of its spring concerts, the works selected for performance being Sterndale Bennett's 'Woman of Samaria,' 'The Procession of the Ark,' from Macfarren's 'Rose of Sharon,' and 'Elijah.'

Miss Marjorie Hayward (violin), Miss Maud Arnold (violincello), and Mr. Harold Rhodes (pianoforte) played Schubert's Trio in B flat and Grainger's 'Handel in the Strand' at Torquay on January 12, and each player also contributed several solos.

Some enterprising music-lovers at Sidmouth have formed a committee to run a series of concerts, and their enterprise is conspicuous in a district usually void of musical endeavour. The second of these concerts took place on January 15, when Mr. S. A. W. Moyle (violincello), Mr. Norman Kendall, Miss Kendall, and Mr. Rowland Huyshe (vocalists) provided an excellent programme. For their next concert, on March 11, the promoters have secured Miss Adela Verne.

DUBLIN

The last performance for the 1919 season at the Theatre of the Royal Dublin Society was that of Dr. Esposito's string orchestra on December 15. Miss Dinah Copeman again exhibited her ability as an executant on the pianoforte.

Notwithstanding the absence of Godowsky (whose place was admirably supplied by Mr. Leonard Borwick) and of Mr. Frank Mullings, the Quinlan Concert at the Theatre Royal, on January 3, was a very great attraction to music-lovers. Miss Perceval Allen, Mr. Clarence Whitehill, and M. Vladimir Rosing were much appreciated by a packed audience. In particular M. Rosing captivated the Dubliners. Mr. Craxton was an excellent accompanist.

At the Abbey Theatre on January 4 an admirable trio recital by Dr. Esposito, Signor Simonetti, and Mr. John Mundy drew a large audience. Beethoven's Trio in B flat received an adequate interpretation, as did also Saint-Saëns's Trio in F and Brahms's Sonata in A.

There were two musical novelties at the 'original' night of the National Literary Society on January 5, one being a delightful setting by the Rev. George O'Neill, S.J., of a charming song by the late Dora Sigerson (Mrs. Clement Shorter), and the other a novel arrangement of the so-called 'Londonderry Air' (in reality a Munster melody) by Prof. Robert O'Dwyer.

The first recital for the New Year in the Theatre of the Royal Dublin Society was on January 12, when the Wessely String Quartet, with Mr. Charles Draper, clarinetist, gave a most interesting performance of chamber music, including Mozart's Clarinet Quintet in A, and Brahms's Quintet in B minor. Glazounov's 'Orientale and Valse' from 'Nouvellettes' (Op. 15) afforded the Quartet much scope for display.

Two enjoyable high-class concerts for a deserving charity were given in the Theatre Royal on January 17 and 18 by the following artists: Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gerald O'Brien, Mr. Robert Radford, Melsa, and Barbirolli, with Mr. G. O'Connor Morris at the pianoforte. The audiences were large and appreciative.

There was much interest in Dublin musical circles over the visit of M. Jacques-Dalcroze, who was announced to give an address on the subject of Eurhythmics, to inaugurate the foundation of a branch of the Dalcroze Society, on January 19 at the Theatre Royal.

EDINBURGH

At the third Paterson Orchestral Concert, on December 15, Mr. Arthur Catterall introduced himself to an Edinburgh audience by a brilliant performance of Brahms's Violin Concerto, Op. 77. On December 22, Miss Adela Verne was solo pianist, and assisted by the orchestra delighted the audience with her virile interpretation of Tchaikovsky's Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor. The other item of unusual interest at this concert was the same composer's Theme and Variations from the Suite in G.

At the fifth concert, on December 29, Madame Guilhermina Suggia created quite a sensation with her extraordinary command of nuance in Dvorák's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra (Op. 104). It is seldom an Edinburgh audience gives vent to such a display of enthusiasm. On this occasion also there was heard for the first time at Edinburgh the late Lieut. George Butterworth's Rhapsody, 'A Shropshire Lad.' Under Mr. Landon Ronald's baton the beauties of this arresting work were fully revealed.

The sixth concert of the Paterson series took place on January 12, when Miss Olga Haley fully justified the reputation she has won in London. Her chief item was 'Air des adieux,' from Tchaikovsky's 'Jean d'Arc.' Brahms's second Symphony and Arensky's 'Silhouettes' were the chief orchestral items.

At the Mossel concert on December 13 the following artists took part: Madame Stralia, Mr. John Coates, Miss Myra Hess, and Mr. Max Mossel.

Mr. Bryden Monteith, a young Edinburgh pianist, at his first recital on December 16 gave promise of great things. His programme was to be commended for its appreciation of the classics. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in F sharp minor and G major, and Schumann's G minor Sonata, received excellent interpretations. A Gigue with variations by Raff, and Chopin's E major Scherzo, were other outstanding items in his programme.

The fourth Reid Orchestral Concert, under Prof. Tovey's direction, included Schubert's great Symphony in C major. Miss Denne Parker contributed two poems, 'The Angel' and 'Dreams,' by Wagner.

On December 20 M. Vladimir Rosing gave a song recital under the auspices of the Classical Series of concerts, all the selections being interpreted with the singer's customary artistry. Only one or two numbers not so well known to Edinburgh audiences need be mentioned. These were Tchaikovsky's 'At the Ball,' Gretchaninov's 'The Steppe,' Moussorgsky's 'Death Serenade,' and Cui's 'Hunger.'

An innovation—for Scotland, at least—was a recital of Christmas Carols by the Royal Choral Union, assisted by the Folk-song Quartet (Miss B. Spencer, Miss F. Oliver, Mr. L. Godfrey, and Mr. F. Ferguson). The performance was given on December 20, and its success will no doubt encourage similar undertakings in many parts of the surrounding area next Christmas season.

Mr. Moonie's choir reopened (after being disbanded for the period of the war) with a Christmas performance of 'Messiah.' Readers may remember the excellent pioneer work of this organization in introducing modern choral works to audiences north of the border, and will welcome the reappearance of the choir under its energetic conductor.

Glasgow Orpheus Choir, under the baton of Mr. Hugh Robertson, gave an excellent performance of unaccompanied part-song music on December 27.

'Messiah' was given by the Royal Choral Union on January 1. The soloists were Miss Fifine de la Cote, Miss Astra Desmond, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Capt. Horace Stevens. Mr. Greenhouse Allt conducted. On the same day, at two excellent ballad concerts, there were heard Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Jessie Millar, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, Mr. Norman Allin, Mr. Arthur Beckwith (violin), and M. Arthur de Greef.

From January 2 to January 10 two performances daily were given by the Band of H. M. Grenadier Guards.

GLASGOW

Under Mr. J. M. Diack the Bach Choir gave a meritorious interpretation of the 'Christmas Oratorio' in St. Mary's Cathedral on December 22. Mr. John Pullein, the organist of the Cathedral, played the accompaniments.

Of the Choral Union's time-honoured New Year's Day performance of 'Messiah,' it is gratifying to record that Handel's masterpiece still holds its place in the people's regard, as was shown by the large audience that the occasion brought together. The traditions and personnel of the Choral Union are peculiarly suitable for effective presentation of oratorio, and this year's performance under Mr. Warren T. Clemens again demonstrated this. The accompaniments were played by the Scottish Orchestra, with Mr. Herbert Walton as organist, and a strong quartet—Misses Agnes Nicholls and Margaret Balfour, and Messrs. John Coates and Herbert Brown—gave the solo music.

Apart from the above choral concerts, the month's record is wholly of the Scottish Orchestra. At the fourth Classical Concert, Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor was magnificently played by Miss Adela Verne. The main attraction on December 30 was Madame Guilhermina Suggia in the solo part of Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor for violoncello. The Symphony was Beethoven's C minor, and British music was represented by George Butterworth's Rhapsody 'A Shropshire Lad.' At the seventh concert, on January 7, Miss Astra Desmond, as vocalist, confirmed the fine impression her singing had made at a previous concert. Brahms's Symphony in D was the main item in the orchestral programme. The appearance of Mr. Mark Hambourg at the eighth concert, on January 14, drew a very large audience which was rewarded by a virile reading of Beethoven's third Pianoforte Concerto in C minor. Arensky's Suite No. 2, 'Silhouettes,' at once caught the popular ear, and the programme ended with a finished performance of Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations. The Saturday Popular Orchestral Concerts continue to grow in favour. Prominent among many fine performances was that of Mr. Harold Samuel in Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto. Each succeeding concert finds the Scottish Orchestra improving in form, the players in spite of strenuous work—in one week they gave six concerts—revealing fine verve and finish under the distinguished conducting of Mr. Landon Ronald.

HASTINGS

As a recreative and educational factor in the social life here, Mr. Julian Clifford's concerts are more than justifying their existence. Besides the weekly Symphony Concerts, that reveal a catholic endeavour, the daily programmes are surprisingly unhackneyed. Among the Symphonies played, Schubert's 'Unfinished' must be singled out for special mention, the work receiving a performance that was unexceptionable for purity of interpretation. Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony, too, has often been made less interesting, while Beethoven in C major has rarely sounded more precise. The new works were Julian Clifford's Overture 'To the New Year,' that revealed no little inspiration combined with masterly orchestration; W. H. Speer's very pleasing 'Cinderella' Suite, of which the composer himself secured a capital performance; and Howard Carr's 'Three Heroes.' The point of the last-named work lies in the section dealing with the thrilling exploit of Lieut. Warneford, V.C., wherein the composer, with uncanny ingenuity, has succeeded in suggesting the arresting drone of militant aircraft.

The concerto players were Mr. Mozart Allan, whose fine dominating 'cello tone was very satisfying in Boëllmann's Variations; Mr. William Lindsay, a pianist who, though his playing is engagingly unaffected, so adapted the tempi of Beethoven's fourth Concerto to the exigencies of the moment that we lost all idea of continuity; and Miss Murray Lambert, a violinist of quite unusual powers, whose passionate intensity in Dvorák's Violin Concerto never caused her to lose her sense of coherence.

Had there been room, M. de Greef could have twice filled the house at his recital on December 27. A pianist of no ordinary attainments, he converted Mendelssohn's 'Variations Sereuses' into a thing of unsuspected beauty. On the other hand, he could be as vivacious as possible in Scarlatti, and though his Chopin playing was full of originality, it was not always free from exaggeration. Less happy was Mr. Herbert Fryer when he played three Chopin Preludes at Miss Kenwood's third chamber concert—the sentiment did not ring true. He was associated with the strings in Brahms's C minor and Hurlstone's Pianoforte Quartets, but the balance of tone in these works was not uniformly good. Miss Kenwood is to be commended for reviving Mozart's duet for violin and viola which she and Mr. E. Tomlinson played with becoming simplicity and grace. At her last concert Miss Kenwood again secured as pianist Mrs. Herbert Kinsey, who, as well in Bach, Brahms, or Debussy solos, as in duet-sonatas by Beethoven and Brahms, showed her thorough mastery of all branches of pianoforte playing.

LIVERPOOL

The fifth concert of the Philharmonic Society, on December 16, had the distinction of being conducted by Sir Thomas Beecham. The programme provided strong contrasts in Beethoven's D major Symphony followed by Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from the Opera 'Le Coq d'Or,' and the glittering 'Rienzi' Overture succeeded by Mozart's sweet if long drawn-out Serenade for strings alone. Particularly alert performances resulted from Sir Thomas's animated direction. The vocalist of the evening, M. Dinh Gilly, a singer of rare qualities, was highly successful in Massenet's 'Vision Fugitive' and the Prologue from 'Pagliacci,' in which his rich and flexible voice was finely used. Not less pleasure was derived from the choir, whose singing of two seasonable items was very harmonious. These were Byrd's 'Lullaby' and the Dutch composer, Sweelinck's, splendid five-voice Motet, 'Hodie Christus natus est'—or, in the English paraphrase by C. H. Lloyd, 'Born to-day.' It was sung with immense spirit, sure attack, and firm tone, one good effect being reserved for the novel pianissimo ending secured by Dr. Pollitt, who conducted the choral items. Elgar's 'Cockaigne' Overture completed the programme. The somewhat late hour however necessitated several members of the band, bound for the last train to Manchester, stealing quietly away before the end.

The musical dovescotes were considerably fluttered by statements reported in an interview Sir Thomas Beecham gave to an enterprising local journalist. In reply to a question as to the possibilities of the Beecham Opera Company paying a visit to Liverpool, Sir Thomas said: 'Opera to be given properly requires not only a big stage and the best possible appliances, but also a theatre holding six or seven thousand people. You haven't such a theatre.

I know very little of Liverpool, but I fail to see any decided improvement in musical taste. Liverpool, despite its great size, is little better than a third-rate provincial town in that respect. Really very few cities have advanced greatly. There is slightly more interest in music in London at present—an interest in new works—but little in the provinces.

Sir Thomas's views thus expressed created not a little surprise and some resentful feeling. Perhaps the sting is that there may be a modicum of truth in his rather sweeping condemnation. At the same time Sir Thomas takes his Company to other third-rate provincial towns, no better off than Liverpool in theatres, accessories, and musical enthusiasm, so that the prevailing idea here is that he looks unfavourably on Liverpool for some other and unknown reasons. But Sir Thomas must surely be allowed to make his own arrangements as to what cities his Company visits, and we must fortify ourselves with the hope that he may be persuaded to come here some time and help to raise our status. Meanwhile we must keep on trying as of yore to work out our own salvation. Perhaps the little episode was taken too seriously. Anyhow, its discussion should do no harm.

At the sixth Philharmonic Concert, on January 13, the orchestra was dispensed with, the noblest numbers in the programme falling to the lot of the choir in Bach's Motet for double-choir of eight voices, 'Come, Jesu, come,' and madrigals by Wilbye, Orlando Gibbons, and Festa. All were steadily and effectively sung, conducted by Dr. Pollitt. The performance of MacCunn's choral ballad, 'Lord Ullin's daughter,' with accompaniments on a pianoforte and organ in place of the vivid orchestral part, was an experiment one cannot commend. Songs by Miss Ruth Vincent, whose style is not suited to Mozart's 'Voi che sapete,' and solos by Mr. Albert Sammons and Mr. William Murdoch, were among the notable features of the occasion. These two great players were associated in Ireland's second Sonata for pianoforte and violin, which is such an individual expression of the composer's genius and of the trend of modern English music. As a soloist Mr. Murdoch showed extraordinary skill in de Séverac's 'Baigneuses au soleil.'

The performance given by the Glasgow Orpheus Choir of forty mixed voices, conducted by Mr. Hugh S. Robertson on January 2, made a deeply favourable impression. This choir of picked voices is in the very front rank of choral bodies, and its members are evidently artists trained by an artist-conductor. The ensemble is quite extraordinary in its blend and finish. This is partly explained by the plan of breathing together and phrasing together, also by the skilful use of half-tones and closed lips, and by humming with open lips. Probably even more is due to the disposition of the parts, as in the modern experimental choral arrangements such as those by Prof. Bantock and Mr. Robertson, which obtain greater variety of tone-colour from an orchestral treatment of the voices in tone-families. Anyhow, the result is a combination of qualities which are in advance of what has up till now passed muster as good choralism. It made the interpretations of the Orpheus Choir more expressive and intimate in their appeal, and gave to the pianos a rare delicacy and ethereal charm. The resolute and harmonious full tone was equally fine, conveying the impression of a larger choir. Great weight of tone cannot however be derived from forty voices, and for this reason, as well as for others, Max Bruch's 'On Jordan's banks' could have been spared. Far more acceptable was the delightful lilting tone in Festa's 'Down in a flow'ry vale.' One needed not to be of Scots extraction fully to enjoy the Choir's singing of national airs, especially the weird melodies of the Hebrides, of which the harmonies of Bantock's 'Sea Sorrow' are so ineffably beautiful. But it was not only in Scots music that the singers excelled, for, singing from memory, they could turn on one of the 'Oriana' madrigals or the 'Londonderry Air' with equal facility. Highly effective also are Mr. Robertson's choral arrangements of the 'Peat fire smooching prayer,' and the 'Eriskay love lilt.' He has a distinct manner in devising eerie crooning harmonies sung around central themes, and a touch of pawky humour is shown in his

'Laird of Cockpen.' No wonder the Choir sings so well when it possesses in its ranks such artistic soloists as Miss Boyd Steven, Miss Jenny McIntyre, Mr. J. M. Ferguson, and Mr. G. Muir, who had a sympathetic accompanist in Mr. Gilbert Esplin. One of the songs, 'I'll gar our gudeman trow,' a new setting of old words by a Glasgow composer, F. G. Scott, has clever touches of piquant and musically interest, qualities displayed also in the same composer's prize part-song, 'Aye she kained her yellow hair.' Other part-songs fortunate in being irradiated by expressive singing included Purcell Mansfield's 'Bonnie Lesley' and 'The Rowan Tree,' Gustav Holst's delightful 'Swansea Town,' and Whittaker's 'The Captain's Lady.' On this the Choir's first visit it was deplorable to see the Philharmonic Hall not even half-filled. This is a disgrace which should be speedily wiped out by the local Scots community.

Whether the band of H.M. Scots Guards is comprised of representative Scotsmen we cannot say, but at its concert on December 31 this combination, conducted by Lieut. Wood, showed what twenty-four first-class bandsmen can do in the 'William Tell' Overture, Coleridge-Taylor's 'Petite Suite,' and, mirabile dictu, Bach's big G minor Organ Fugue.

One of the great events of the year is the Welsh Choral Union's 'Messiah' concert, which was given on December 22. All seats in the Philharmonic Hall had been secured weeks beforehand, and it would be impossible to find a more attentive and appreciative audience—one might indeed describe it as a congregation—to whom this annual occasion is in the nature of a religious function. The performance was very fine, and one of the best in the long record of the Choral Union. Under Mr. Hopkin Evans's clear direction the Welsh singers need fear no loss of laurels, especially as he is about to take up residence at Liverpool, and thus be spared the long journeys to rehearsals from South Wales. Of the vocal principals Miss Lilian Stiles-Allen was revealed as a 'Messiah' soprano of rare distinction. To a voice of unusual power and beauty of tone she adds artistic perception and much dramatic instinct. Worthy associates were found in Miss Monica Scott, Mr. Arthur Jordan, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth. Mr. Akeroyd led the band, with Mr. A. Hall as solo trumpet and Mr. Benton as organist.

Another great audience assembled for the 'Messiah' performance in aid of St. Dunstan's Hostel, given on December 27 by the Liverpool Choral Society, conducted by Mr. P. Ingram. The singing of this large choir, which is composed of excellent material, was careful and creditable, if not exhilarating. It was not helped by indifferent orchestral accompaniment. The solo vocalists were Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Astra Desmond, Mr. Hughes Macklin (who is better suited in opera), and Mr. Watkin Mills.

The English Folk-Dance Society, Liverpool and District branch, of which Mr. Cecil Sharp is president and Mr. William Rushworth a vice-president, held an open meeting in St. George's Hall on January 3. The Vice-Chancellor of the University, Dr. J. G. Adami, occupied the chair, and Miss Daking gave an interesting lecture on the aims and achievements of the Society, which locally is in good hands and doing excellent work in reviving and teaching the old English dances. Examples of these were given on this occasion in a delightfully informal way.

The third Quinlan Concert, on January 10, was sustained by Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Clarence Whitehill, Madame Renée Chemet, Mr. Leonard Borwick, and Mr. Harold Craxton, who accompanied. Notable items were Madame Kirkby Lunn's 'Che Faro,' Madame Chemet's Tartini-Kreisler Variations, and Mr. Borwick's playing of Chopin's C sharp minor Scherzo.

Dr. James Lyon's one-Act wordless opera, or 'melomime,' 'Toinette,' was played by the H. B. Phillips Opera Company in the Shakespeare Theatre on January 14, as a prelude to 'Hansel and Gretel,' in which work the Company is specialising during its four months' season. 'Toinette,' as one of three similar short works, is a brilliant example of its composer's dramatic instinct and skilful scoring. The characters were well represented by Miss Gladys Seager (Toinette), Mr. Lewys James (Marquis), and Mr. A. McCarthy (Sergeant).

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT

The chronicle of recent music here falls into three sections—plenty of opera, chamber-music and recitals, with few orchestral and miscellaneous concerts. But before proceeding to its consideration, reference must be made to the vexed question of permitting Sunday evening concerts, which has been settled in favour of the applicants, the National Sunday League. The penultimate move of the Justices was to authorise these concerts upon the perfectly absurd condition that seventy-five per cent. of the receipts were devoted to charitable objects. But the promoters tabled balance-sheets showing more losses than profits, and stated that the League bore the losses and charity gained whenever profits were made. No guarantee was, however, given on this point, as estimated costs to-day ranged from £70 to £90. Ultimately permission was granted for four concerts, and Sunday music of a good type was thus vindicated. The first concert came too late for notice this month, but Mr. Walter Mudie's Sunday League Orchestra and soloists from the Opera were announced.

The Beecham Opera Company returned for a nine weeks' season starting on Boxing Day last, and opened its doors, with every seat sold for its first thirteen performances, the demand far exceeding the supply for the holiday period, and much the same healthy state of affairs has prevailed since. One misses a few old favourites—Messrs. Heather, Radford, and Julius Harrison—but welcomes the return of Mr. Percy Heming and the advent of Miss Stralita and Messrs. Burke, Dinh Gilly, and O'Brien. Mr. Mullings's long indisposition caused several redistributions in various casts which are now readily met with the Company's increased resources. More important, however, than all these is the inclusion of Mr. Albert Coates amongst the conductors, and under his guidance we provincials heard for the first time 'Prince Igor' and 'Parsifal' on January 9 and 12.

Manchester has now confirmed its early impression of him as one of the conductors who matter. All on the stage were well prepared, but many of the orchestra could have had no previous knowledge of the bulk of these two operas, and besides had been playing eight times every week, so the possibilities of rehearsal were severely restricted. That two such comparatively flawless performances resulted is one more tribute to the prevailing high-level of orchestral musicianship and also to the conductor's sure grasp in both works.

In some respects the British 'Parsifal' can challenge and surpass Bayreuth. No member of the cast had any acquaintance with Bayreuth tradition or experience, thus everything conducted to a self-expression springing directly from the music's inspiration. In the scenario I missed only the sense of spaciousness and vista which is so peculiar to Bayreuth. The English scenery was built for a stage-depth of about seventy feet, and the Manchester theatre boasts only half this accommodation, yet the consciousness of compression was not overpowering, probably due to the precision of the stage processional movements, which synchronised so perfectly with the completion of the musical phrases. The tone produced by the Knights of the Grail offends sensitive chorists here, and wants drastic treatment, otherwise the choral results on and off the stage were marvellously good as to quality, intonation, precision, and finish. The Bayreuth pilgrim can never experience such thrills as were ours in the Flower Maidens' music. Anything more ravishing to the ear than this efflorescence of song led by Misses Sylvia Nelis and Bessie Tyas and their several companions I never expect to hear. Similarly the sense of altitude in the Grail 'celestial' choruses was miraculous, considering the stage limitations. Any slip in the co-ordination of forces in the orchestral-well, on and off and above the stage in such a dangerously complicated scheme, spells greater disaster in 'Parsifal' than in any other music-drama, so subtly does Wagner enthrall one's senses. But everybody exhibited the quiet confidence denoting complete mastery. Each of the six chief characters—Amfortas (Percy Heming), Titirel (Foster Richardson), Gurnemanz (Norman Allin), Parsifal (Walter Hyde), Klingsor (Herbert Langley), Kundry (Gladys Ancrum)—is the equal or superior of any member of the Bayreuth 1904 'Parsifal.' From every point of view Miss Ancrum's Wagnerian competence is one of the great things not merely of contemporary art but of European experience. She has every attribute of the complete Wagnerian, and with ripening experience may well become a British Ternina. Could Van Rooy at his best excel Norman Allin's Gurnemanz in sheer splendour and nobility of vocal expression? The scene at the well on Good Friday morning revealed a hitherto quite unsuspected vein of tenderness in his characterisation. The astonishing rate at which several of the members of the Company have advanced towards ripe artistic maturity was more manifest in 'Parsifal' than in any other item in the Beecham repertory. Langley's Klingsor was an amazingly graphic presentation in its vehement intensity. One remembers Hans Richter, in his somewhat gruff, paternal manner, hailing Walter Hyde years ago as an ideal Siegmund, and the direct simplicity of his Parsifal conception would have appealed to the veteran in much the same way. I have not heard Percy Heming since the early war days, when his Kurwenal lent such dignity and distinction to Act 3 of those early 'Tristan' performances. His Amfortas is one of those remarkable portrayals that completely silence one's critical faculties. Our artistic sensibilities are ever craving this satisfaction, and I should doubt very much whether in any other opera quite the same measure of fulfilment is attained, because with these people an ample technical equipment is allied to brain-power of a very high order. The month of February brings six performances (on the 3rd, 6th, 9th, 11th, 17th, and 20th), and I hope to return to other aspects of this subject next month.

Could anything be much further removed from the satisfying artistic unity of Wagnerian drama than the loosely constructed 'Prince Igor,' which seems to have neither beginning nor end in that sense? Orchestrally there is very little to grip one until the wild abandon of the dance in the Camp of the Polovstys. The more romantic side of Igor and Jaroclavna is not obtrusive, and yet the first two performances on January 9 and 14 led to scenes of enthusiasm without parallel here, Mr. Coates having to take call after call at the close of the Camp scene. The Russian Ballet last summer familiarised us with the dance, and numerous concert performances of the orchestral and choral dances have been given in the Free Trade Hall. The Russian Ballet orchestra was too sluggish, and the marvel was that the Russians danced with such verve whilst the playing languished as it did. Under Mr. Coates we got for the first time the full measure of the 'Dances Polovstiennes' with adequate accompaniment, choral and orchestral, all at full pressure, and herein lies the secret of the grip of the opera—its stirring appeal to the primal rhythmic instinct. The hearer's mind is dancing all the time, and his nature tingles in sympathetic excitement with the wild barbaric mood of the thing. I do not know whether the general palate will continue to relish the savour, but I intend to give mine a chance, and also to feast on the beauties of colour in garments, scenery, and lighting which vie with those of 'Boris' and 'Ivan the Terrible.' The public attitude towards 'Le Coq d'Or' has been one steady crescendo of interest. Baffled at first by its many (to our ears and eyes) eccentricities, the patrons of this strange work have come to revel in its exotic quality. At first they found much incongruity in the drolleries of Guidon and Polkan, as though to say, 'Do things like this occur in "grand" opera?' Now they chuckle with the actors themselves at many of the extemporizations of fresh 'business.' The music of the Queen of Shemakhin, an ecstasy of sound, song, colour, and dance, recalls Kubla Khan's vision of the maiden with the dulcimer, to such delight does her symphony of song win one. In this Miss Nelis is surely incomparable.

Manchester suffers this winter as never before from clashing musical interests. Rosing's recital coincided with the 'Parsifal' production; the fine Quinlan Concert, the Brodsky Quartet, and second 'Parsifal' performance all came on the same evening. Manchester sadly needs a controller in these matters. Godowsky did not make his promised appearance with the Quinlan party on January 15, but the programme was quite an ideal one of its kind, and yielded a night of great singing and playing of worthy music from Mesdames Renée Chemet and Kirkby Lunn, and Messrs. Leonard Borwick and Clarence Whitehill.

Christmastide brought welcome variations from the perpetual round of 'Messiah' performances in the most distinguished programme of Advent Songs I ever heard from Miss Muriel Robinson on Christmas Eve, and portions of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' at the Cathedral, under Dr. Wilson.

The very numerous 'best brass band blowers' of Lancashire and the West Riding worshipped at the shrine of the Coldstream Guards band on January 1, 2, and 3. We wonder when native writers will create for them a literature worthy of their devotion.

The Bowdon Chamber Society is always first in the field, and on December 20 Miss Charlotte Elwell and Mr. Forbes played César Franck's Sonata, and M. Georges Pitsch some violoncello solos which included a somewhat unusual arrangement by himself of Ravel's 'Pavane.' Miss Flora Woodman was the vocalist.

The orchestral concert of the Manchester School of Music, on December 22, gave a hearing to Weber's 'Ruler of the spirit' Overture, Mozart's D major ('Haffner') Symphony, Glazounov's 'Scène Dansante,' Op. 81, Frederick Laurence's 'Tristes' for strings, Herbert Howells' 'Puck's Minuet,' and Percy Grainger's third 'Room-music Tit-bit,' entitled 'Walking Tune'—an enterprising selection. Mr. Albert T. Cross had a busy evening conducting these and a number of solo works.

Manchester has probably produced more chamber-music combinations of native players than any other English centre, and the newly-formed Stonely Quartet has this month entered upon what we hope will be a useful artistic career.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT

The Armstrong College Choral Society, which in the past has introduced many new works to Newcastle, upheld its reputation at the concert given on December 10 by a fine performance of Dr. C. B. Rootham's scholarly work, 'For the Fallen.' Other items in the programme were Bach's Cantata No. 95, 'Since Christ is all my being,' a group of songs by Frank Bridge, traditional sea-songs arranged by Vaughan Williams, and Mozart's Fantasia and Sonata in C minor, with Grieg's second pianoforte part. The soloists were Miss Beatrice Paramor and Mr. E. J. Potts, Messrs. G. W. Danskin and A. F. Floyd were at the pianoforte, and Mr. W. G. Whittaker conducted.

The Newcastle Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Hamilton Harty, gave a concert in the Town Hall, Gateshead, on December 12. The programme consisted of the Overture to 'The Magic Flute,' Bizet's Suite No. 1 ('L'Arlesienne'), Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, Op. 16, and the C minor Symphony of Beethoven. Mr. Anderson Tyrer gave a fine interpretation of the solo part in the Grieg Concerto.

The Newcastle Philharmonic Orchestra has arranged a series of three concerts for this season, the first of which took place on Sunday afternoon, December 14. The orchestral items comprised the Overture to Smetana's 'The Bartered Bride,' Stanford's 'Irish' Rhapsody, the introduction to Act 3 of 'Die Meistersinger,' Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' and Sibelius's 'Finlandia.' Miss Ethel MacLelland sang the aria 'Deh Vieni' from Mozart's 'Figaro,' and 'I will sing unto the Lord' from Parry's 'Judith.' Mr. Edgar L. Bainton conducted.

The last of a series of Municipal Chamber Concerts was held on December 17, when a small orchestra under the direction of Capt. H. Amers contributed excerpts from Tchaikovsky, Coleridge-Taylor, Liszt, and Debussy.

The Jarrow Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. George Dodds, introduced two novelties in the shape of W. G. Whittaker's choral arrangement of the Scottish tune 'The De'il's awa' wi' th' Exciseman,' and a group of posthumous songs by Hubert Parry.

It has simply rained performances of 'Messiah' at Newcastle. Really it would seem that many think Handel had written the only Christmas music in existence. The Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union set the ball rolling with a splendid presentation of the work in the Cathedral, under the direction of Dr. Henry Coward, who has now bidden farewell to Tyneside. The solo work was sustained by Misses Bertha Armstrong and A. Elliott, Messrs. J. Bowman and W. Hendry, while the artistic organ accompaniment of Mr. William Ellis constituted a feature of the evening.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company is here on a month's visit, but with the exception of three modern British operas—McLean's 'Quentin Durward,' Colson's 'Pro Patria,' and De Lara's 'Three Masks'—is confining itself to 'house-fillers,' even including the everlasting 'Maritana' and 'Bohemian Girl.'

The Newcastle Bach Choir gave a delightfully varied concert of British music on December 20, that was attended by a large and appreciative audience. The 'Six Pastorals' of Walford Davies for voices, strings, and pianoforte, two Hebridean folk-songs arranged for solo with choral accompaniment by Bantock, Sea Shanties arranged by Dr. R. R. Terry, Vaughan Williams's 'Fantasia on Christmas Carols,' and a group of Traditional Carols, including two settings by W. G. Whittaker, made up the vocal part of the programme. The string orchestra gave Dowland's 'Lachrymæ,' and Suites by Boyce and Holst. The soloists were Miss A. Lawton and Mr. W. Hendry, Miss Annie Eckford was at the pianoforte, and Mr. W. G. Whittaker conducted.

The Carlisle Choral Society has been re-formed under the conductorship of Dr. F. W. Wadely, Cathedral organist, and has given a performance of Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' and Charles Wood's 'Dirge for two Veterans,' the soloist in the latter being Mr. Robert Radford. Part 1 of 'Messiah' and a selection of carols were sung in the Cathedral by the same Society on January 8.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT

Mr. Bernard Johnson's third 'People's Concert' took place on December 11, when the two well-known artists, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Miss Myra Hess, were responsible for the programme. Mr. Elwes's choice included Handel's 'Where'er you walk,' Beethoven's 'Adelaide,' and several examples of modern songs. Miss Myra Hess gave a careful reading of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 110), three Preludes of Rachmaninoff, and three Debussy items.

The annual railway-men's concert in aid of their benevolent institutions was given on December 11, when the performers included Miss Flora Woodman, Madame Edna Thornton, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, Mr. Fraser Gange, Mr. Arnold Trowell, and Mr. David Richards.

Great interest was attached to the inaugural performance by St. Mary's Choral Society, recently formed under Dr. Radcliffe, the occasion being a recital of Christmas music on December 30. Mr. John Collett, of St. Paul's Cathedral, contributed two solos, Bach's 'Haste ye, shepherds,' and 'God breaketh the battle,' from Parry's 'Judith.' The choral numbers included 'Come and hear the angels' (Lloyd), 'Whence comes this light?' (Bremer), Sweelinck's Motet, 'Born to-day,' Berlioz's 'Thou must leave Thy lowly dwelling,' 'O little town of Bethlehem' (Walford Davies), and 'Holy night, peaceful night!' (Barnby).

Dr. Radcliffe gave the first of a series of organ recitals on January 3. His programme comprised Rheinberger's Finale and Fugue from Sonata No. 7, in F minor, Schubert's 'Serenade,' and a 'Rigaudon' by Lulli. Mr. Fred Mountney played two violin solos—'Kol Nidrei,' by Max Bruch, and Vieuxtemps's 'Rêverie.' On January 7 Miss Phyllis Lett and Mr. Albert Sammons were heard at Mr. Johnson's fourth concert. Miss Lett gave a widely-diversified selection of songs, ranging from Lulli and Purcell to Elgar, Granville Bantock, Walford Davies, and Balakireff. Mr. Sammons was heard in Wilhelm's transcription of Chopin's 'Nocturne,' in D, Kreisler's 'Caprice Viennois,' Sinigaglia's 'Rhapsody,' Paul Juon's 'Aria,' Brahms's 'Hungarian Dance' in D, and his own clever 'Variations on a Theme.' Mr. F. B. Kiddle contributed an excellent performance of the pianoforte part in Beethoven's Sonata for violin and pianoforte (Op. 24), and accompanied with much skill.

An interesting vocal and instrumental recital took place on December 10, at Derby. Mr. Laurence Lee proved himself a delightful pianist, Miss Constance Hardcastle displayed a beautiful soprano voice, and Miss Grace Burrows played violin solos admirably. Mr. Ben Burrows accompanied, and collaborated with Miss Burrows in a presentation of Coleridge-Taylor's Sonata in D minor.

The Derby Choral Union's performance of 'Messiah,' on December 31, merits special mention as the first performance of this organization under Dr. Henry Coward, who gave such an original reading that we are informed 'some of the choral numbers were hardly recognisable.' The soloists were Miss Florence Mellors, Miss Lottie Beaumont, Mr. Henry Brearley, and Mr. Robert Radford.

The Coldstream Guards Band, under Major Mackenzie Rogan, sustained the bulk of the programmes at Messrs. Russell's two concerts on January 8, at Leicester. There was cause for regret that the Oriana Choral Society did not have more to do. Dudley Buck's unaccompanied 'Hymn to Music' was sung very finely indeed. A hearty encore brought forth a delicate interpretation of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Sea Shell.' Excellent account was also given of Elgar's 'Lullaby,' and the 'Dance' from the 'Bavarian Highlands.' Miss Stella Power contributed several songs, making a good impression on Leicester audiences by her clever vocalisation.

A performance of 'Elijah' was given by the Long Eaton Choral Society on December 11. The soloists were Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Phyllis Hamer, Mr. Topliss Green, and Mr. Leonard Lovesey.

The Gainsborough Orchestral Society, which was suspended during the war, has now been re-organized, with Mr. Salter, of Boston, as conductor.

Since the surfeit of 'Messiah' performances at Christmas-tide, concerts are being gradually resumed, but at the time of writing only a very few that are of any importance have to be recorded. The Leeds Bohemian Concert on January 7 was devoted entirely to works by native composers, and it must be allowed that the three represented came off well. Stanford's String Quartet in B flat, written in 1907, in memory of his intimate friend Joachim, which received its first performance at these concerts in 1908, was a welcome revival, for it is a strong, thoughtful composition, scholarly as a matter of course, but having a real if reticent emotion in the Adagio, which is the most distinguished, if not the most charming movement of the work. Elgar's recent Quartet formed a delightful pendant, romantic and highly characteristic of the composer. Here again the slow movement is the most engaging of the three, and it made an immediate impression on the audience. As a 'buffer state' between these two strongly contrasted works came Frank Bridge's charming fantasies on three popular old tunes, which are always enjoyable. The Quartet—Mr. Bensley Ghent, Mr. Dyson Perkins, Miss Lily Simms, and Mr. Arthur Haynes—has only recently been formed, but already its ensemble is good, and will doubtless acquire even greater unity and finish as its members continue to play together.

On January 5, the band of the Coldstream Guards visited Leeds, and under Major Mackenzie Rogan's direction played so artistically that we wished the programme had been of more distinction. The vocalist was Miss Stella Power, who promises to become a very clever singer, but who is handicapped by being advertised as 'The Little Melba,' which provokes unnecessary comparisons. The most generally interesting feature of the Leeds Saturday Orchestral Concert on January 17 was a new Suite by the conductor, Mr. Hamilton Harty. It is entitled 'Fantasy Scenes from an Eastern Romance,' and its four movements illustrate a little story of a juggler who manages to win the affection of a Sultan's favourite, and, what is more, to elope with her into a region where he is safe from the Sultan's wrath. The music is concise, artistic in workmanship, and made piquant by some slight, but effective, suggestions of Orientalism. The Suite went exceedingly well, and made an immediate impression, the final movement having to be repeated.

At Bradford the unique series of Free Chamber Concerts managed by the indefatigable Mr. S. Midgley, and subsidised by a few local music-lovers, entered upon their tenth season on January 5, when Mr. Midgley, with Mr. Dunford as violinist and Mr. Harry Watson as clarinetist, played some interesting music—Walthew's Clarinet Trio, Ireland's first Violin Sonata, Gabriel Fauré's Violin Sonata in A minor, and Gade's 'Fantasiestücke.' The vocalist was Miss Alice Moxon, a youthful soprano whose expressive singing deserves great praise. The Bradford Permanent Orchestra resumed its season on January 10 with a capital programme that was conducted by a new-comer at these concerts, Mr. Julius Harrison, whose refined taste and clear beat produced a most favourable impression. Two unfamiliar works were presented. At these concerts a worthy feature is the constant recognition of contemporary native art, and this time we had a 'Children's Overture' by Roger Quilter, in which some nursery tunes are woven together in a fashion which recalls that most delightful of 'children's' operas, 'Hansel and Gretel.' The other novelty was Napravnik's 'Fantasie Russe' for pianoforte and orchestra, a very attractive work, based on three characteristic Russian tunes, happily contrasted in character. The soloist in this, and in Debussy's 'Sacred and Profane' Dances, was Mr. Erik Brewerton, who is a very interesting pianist, combining the brilliance of the virtuoso with the refined taste of the artist. Mr. Herbert Brown was the vocalist, and his spirited singing and clear enunciation made his performances very enjoyable. At the fourth of his series of organ recitals in All Saints' Church, Bradford, Mr. Charles Stott played Vierne's second Symphony, Mr. Arthur Wilkes, of Manchester Cathedral, contributing some vocal solos.

Signorina Jole Bertoglio gave a pianoforte recital on December 5 in the hall of the Royal Conservatorium when she played the 'Ciaccona Variata' of Handel, 'Giga,' Scarlatti, and Sonata Op. 5, Brahms, obtaining well-merited applause. Signorina Bertoglio is not a new-comer in Milanese musical circles, inasmuch as she received her musical education in this city. Perfectly balanced in her technical and interpretative equipment, perhaps the only weak spot in her execution (there must be a souffçon of diabolical satisfaction in the mind of every critic where weak points are concerned) is her apparent failure to rise to those moments when sheer power should preponderate. But not all pianists can acquire the Carreño crash. Signorina Bertoglio is, however, a first-class pianist, and perhaps the fact of her lack of hammer-force indicates, after all, a refined musical personality.

Another lady pianist well known at Milan is Mile Wanda Landowska, a Pole. She takes part in the series of concerts with the Società del Quartetto is giving in the hall of the Conservatorium, where, along with much pianoforte music, she is presenting classic numbers on the original clavicembalo for which they were conceived. The public will thus gain an insight into the manner in which the old composers moulded and directed their inspirations for their interpretative medium. Bach, Handel, Gluck, and Padre Martini are among the composers drawn upon. Mile Landowska is also a composer, and received a veritable ovation after playing her 'Bourrée d'Auvergne,' which is written in a popular style. She was also very successful in Martini's 'Gavotte des moutons.'

The alterations to the Scala stage have not prevented a concert being given in this theatre on December 13, when the Civica Scuola di Canto Corale celebrated the fiftieth year of its constitution. The function had the imprimatur of the Commune of Milan, and was organized by maestro Filippo Brunetto. The Syndic and the Prefect, as well as all the civic authorities, were in attendance. The Civica Scuola was created by the Commune proper, and is composed of elements collected from all quarters of the city, particularly from the various choral schools, the object being to provide entertainment in after hours which is both elevating and educational. The programme included the 'Resurrexit' of Berlioz; 'Last Supper' and 'Biblical Cantata' of Wagner; 'Manzoni' Cantata, Ponchielli; 'La Nuit,' Saint-Saëns (sung by female voices); and 'Alleluja,' César Franck, which received a brilliant performance and excited much applause. The best-known choral schools taking part in the concert were the 'Verdi,' 'Donizetti,' La Cappella del Duomo, and La Scuola Co-operativa Corale, furnishing a choir of six hundred voices. The concert was repeated a few days later.

VENICE

The Malibran theatre at Venice has been completely restored, and is now opening its doors once again after seven years' silence. The theatre, built as far back as 1677, was called Teatro dei Grimani after the then powerful family by whom it was erected. The largest and finest theatre of its period, it was adorned with beautiful paintings, gilded bas-reliefs and entablatures, and every conceivable embellishment of decorative art of those times. The first opera to be performed was 'Vespasiano,' of Pallavicini, in 1678. From 1747 onwards dramatic works were largely represented. In 1834 the theatre became the property of the Gallo family, who modified the fabric, introducing a gallery, separate boxes, and enormous windows, the object of the latter being to permit day performances to be given. When the famous Maria Malibran, sister of the centenarian singing-master Manuel Garcia, sang there with so much éclat, the Gallo family baptized it the Malibran theatre. In 1882 the house was closed for four years, during which other paintings were added as well as decorations after the Arabo-Egyptian style. The renovated building soon became a centre of popular performances.

The Italian Orchestral Federation has received a letter from the orchestral players at Vienna, conveying a moving appeal to their Italian colleagues 'to alleviate the sufferings of their wives and children.' 'Food,' say these musicians, 'cannot be obtained for love or money,' and they continue: 'This is not an appeal for alms, but for food against payment—reasonable payment—because here at Vienna the cost of foodstuffs sent through the generosity of your country are bordering on the fantastic, and consequently are prohibitive so far as our class is concerned. The food rations distributed by our Government are sufficient only to sustain body and soul for a few hours, and not for a week as intended. Our children are without milk, rice, cocoa. . . . and we are old, tired, shivering, and hungry. Trusting in your help. . . . The Federation has responded to the call with the generous spontaneity of the Italian character where the question concerns charitable effort. Funds and foodstuffs are being expeditiously collected, in spite of the food shortage throughout the country, and when Italy will soon be called upon to harbour some twenty thousand Viennese children of all classes.

E. HERBERT CESARI.

ROME

Is it proper for a great master to write operetta? This is the question which has deeply agitated the followers and admirers of Pietro Mascagni during the last month. From the moment that the Quirino Theatre announced an operetta, 'Si,' in three Acts, from the pen of the famous Maestro, a lively polemical battle raged, as was to be expected, between the supporters who shouted 'Si,' 'Si,' and the objectors who yelled 'No "Si"' ('Si' means 'yes'). The arguments used on both sides may easily be imagined—the one objecting that it was a subversion of genius and a lowering of art for Mascagni to write an operetta, the other contemptuously retorting 'Rubbish—as if Benvenuto Cellini didn't model saltcellars as well as the Perseus, or as if Leonardo, having painted the Cena, disdained to turn his hand to caricature, or as if Muratori scorned to write pretty little sonnets for the Arcady Club just because he wrote immortal volumes of Annals.'

The controversy would have continued to rage, with the usual result of such discussions, but for a new excitement that was added to the affair in the prohibition of the opera by Mascagni himself, and the immediate decision of the Lombardo Company to ignore the composer's interdict. The day announced for the first representation witnessed a stream of anxious inquirers at the box office of the Quirino, and up to the last moment great uncertainty reigned as to who would win—the composer or the advisers of the Company. The Company did not budge—and 'Si' was produced.

In the event the Lombardo Company won, but would have gained in honour had it lost. The casus belli between composer and Company was the libretto, written by Carlo Lombardo (who wrote also the 'Duchessa del Bal Tabarin,' an operetta that is exceedingly popular). It seems, however, that Mascagni composed the music, having before him only the verses assigned to him, and the complete text of the operetta he did not see until a few days before its production. Whether the text was purposely withheld from Mascagni we cannot say; but the scurrility, the ambiguities, and equivocations abounding in the libretto support the idea that the composer was misled as to the nature of the production with which he had associated his name.

So much, then, for the literary (!) part of the new work, which naturally has rendered it impossible that the music should have that success which it deserves. Mascagni has done his part splendidly and successfully, especially in the first and second Acts, where the music is graceful and spontaneous, and one cannot doubt that it will be eagerly added to the repertory of the composer's admirers, separated from the unlovely element with which it is unfortunately associated.

The reception accorded the new work was unequal. The first and second Acts were enthusiastically applauded; but the third Act, in which the stupidity, banality, and grossness of the libretto reach their culminating point, was but coldly received.

LEONARD PEYTON.

Miscellaneous

LONDONDERRY.—A series of three afternoon Subscription Chamber Concerts, given by Mr. Henry Coleman, was concluded on December 10. The chief works given were: Pianoforte Trios of Mozart in G, and Beethoven in E flat, Grieg's Sonata in C minor for Pianoforte and Violin, and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. At the third concert Mr. Percy Whitehead sang thirteen songs, including six traditional airs. The first Philharmonic Concert took place on December 18, when 'St. Paul' was given, with Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Winifred Thompson, Mr. John Vine, and Capt. Horace Stevens as principals, and Mr. Henry Coleman as conductor. On December 21 the annual performance of 'Messiah' (Part 1) took place in the Cathedral, with a chorus of a hundred voices, the choir being augmented by picked voices from the Philharmonic Society. On December 22 the first Annual Carol Concert was held in the Guildhall. A number of traditional carols were sung by a choir of three hundred and fifty voices, Church choirs of all denominations taking part, conducted by Mr. Henry Coleman.

The Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society has re-commenced its activities. Mr. Arthur W. Payne is again the conductor of the orchestra, and Mr. Stanley Roper is in charge of the male-voice choir. Owing to losses through the war, there are vacancies in the ranks of both orchestra and choir. Membership is not confined to members of the Stock Exchange. Those desirous of joining should write to the hon. secretary, Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society, Stock Exchange, E.C., stating their instrument, voice, and experience. Founded in the year 1883, the Society has done excellent service in the cause of music, and for many years its concerts at Queen's Hall were among the most popular events of the season. We are glad to hear that the prospects of this Society's revival are bright.

The Y.M.C.A. Music Section acknowledges with thanks 'Omega's' subscription of 10s. in answer to appeal.

It is announced that the copyrights of the majority of the late Alfred R. Gaul's works will be sold by auction at Messrs. Puttick & Simpson's on February 6. The copyrights offered include those of 'The Holy City,' 'Ruth,' the Passion Service, and 'The Silent Land.'

A 'dowler' from America: 'Schubert was born in 1692 and died in 1868; he had his musical vision from some book, and wrote forty feuds in all kinds of keys.' 'Feuds' is especially good.

THE CRYES OF LONDON

HUMOROUS FANCY

THREE SETTINGS FOR S.A.T.B. BY

(1) RICHARD DEERING, (2) ORLANDO GIBBONS,
 AND
 (3) THOMAS WEEBKES.

NOS. 1 AND 2, PRICE 6d. EACH; NO. 3, PRICE 4d.

The old Cryes of London have formed the subject of interesting articles, poems, and pictures, ever since old John Lydgate (1370-1450), a Benedictine of Bury St. Edmund's Abbey, wrote his "London Lackpenny."

Hindley, in his interesting but rather discursive book on "The Cries of London," says: "From the time of Elizabeth to that of Queen Victoria, authors, artists, and printers combined, have presented the cries of Itinerant Traders of London in almost similar form and in various degrees of quality, from the roughest and worst wood-cut blocks to the finest copper and steel-plate engravings or skilfully-wrought etchings. While many of the early English dramatists often introduced the subject, eminent composers were wont to set to music, as a Catch, Glee, or Roundelay, all the London Cries then most in vogue. They were, I hear, 'ryhte merrie songs,' and the music was well engraved."—(J. F. B.)

"The Diversions increase in interest. The Fourth and Sixth may be specially mentioned as being the perfection of musical light music."—Morning Post.

"Contrast is one of the leading features of the work, specially marked in the Third Diversion, which might illustrate a rural fête of bucolic frolic."—Referee.

"The delicate Second Diversion is a gem of joyous animation."—Globe.

"It is brilliant and cheerful, extremely clever, and has the spontaneity which can only be achieved by complete mastery of resource."—Star.

"It was full of grace, melodious, and, above all, lucidly expressed. The Fifth Diversion is a fine exposition of a valse theme."—Weekly Dispatch.

"The composer has lost none of his virility and joyousness—it is fresh open-air music."—Observer.

"Edward German's Theme and Six Diversions provide us with a whiff of sweet English briar-rose—very refreshing."—World.

"It is a singularly smooth, and even delightful piece of work."—Manchester Guardian.

Says one of our Craftsmen :

"SUPER-EXCELLENT STRINGS NEED SUPER-EXCELLENT PACKING."

"I never take one of our strings from its envelope but I think how fine is the packing. And then just as quickly I realise that such grand strings need to be packed in distinctive style. But, of course, clothes don't make the man, do they? It is PERFORMANCE that tells the tale. So, I would say to all you musicians, try our strings. Write for a Sample String—put it on your instrument—note the fine tone. I tell you that British Strings ("Cathedral" and "Summit") are as near perfection as man can make them. But try the Strings—recommend them to your friends—and you will never want strings of a foreign make again."

OF ALL MUSIC DEALERS.

CATHEDRAL STRINGS.—Beautifully packed in boxes of a dozen. Every string in its transparent, dust- and damp-proof envelope, and each string tissue-wrapped in addition. A delight to the eye when taken from the envelope, and a revelation in tonal-quality when first tried on the instrument.

SUMMIT STRINGS.—Also packed in dozen boxes, and made in the same careful way. A popular string at a popular price. Each string is enclosed in a black, gilt-lettered, damp- and dust-proof envelope. A strikingly fine-toned string. All British Strings ("Cathedral" and "Summit") are best tried on your instrument.

Send for FREE Sample String.

This offer of a Sample String applies to Violin, Mandoline, and Banjo. State exact String required.

MEDIUM VOICE. PRICE 2s. NET CASH.

Among the many poems called forth by the War, "THE MARCH," by Mr. J. C. SQUIRE, is certainly one of the finest and most poignant, and this musical setting of it, by one of our foremost composers, is entirely worthy of it. It reflects, in a wonderfully simple and impressive way, the lofty pathos of the poem with its feeling of intense tragedy, softened only by the nobility of its conception.

THE

YORK GATE, MARYLEBONE ROAD, N.W.1.

INSTITUTED 1822.

INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER, 1830.

Patron: HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

President: H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT AND STRATHEARN, K.G.

PRINCIPAL—SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL MACKENZIE, Mus.D., LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.A.M.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC offers to students of both sexes (whether amateur or professional) a thorough training in all branches of music under the most able and distinguished Professors. In addition to receiving individual lessons in the various branches of the Curriculum, students have the advantage of attending the Orchestral, Choral, and Chamber Music Classes, and the weekly Lectures on music and musicians. Evidence of their progress is given at the Fortnightly and Public Concerts and by periodical Operatic and Dramatic Performances.

There are three Terms in the Academic year—viz., the Michaelmas Term, from Michaelmas to Christmas; the Lent Term, from early in January to Easter; and the Midsummer Term, from early in May until the end of July.

A large number of Scholarships and Prizes are founded and are competed for periodically.

Students who show special merit and ability receive the distinction of being elected by the Directors, Associates of the Institution, and are thereby entitled to the use after their names of the letters A.R.A.M. Students who distinguish themselves in the musical profession after quitting the Institution may be elected by the Directors, Fellows of the Royal Academy of Music, and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the letters F.R.A.M.

Subscribers have the privilege of attending the Lectures and Public Concerts and of introducing friends in proportion to the amount of their subscriptions.

An examination of persons trained independently of the Academy is held twice a year—viz., during the Summer and Christmas vacations—successful candidates at which are elected Licentiates of the Academy, and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the letters L.R.A.M. The syllabus is issued annually at Easter.

A Special Teachers' Training Course, to meet the requirements of the Teachers' Registration Council, has been instituted, prospectus of which is now ready.

A JUNIOR DEPARTMENT is now open.

Prospectus, entry form, and all further information may be obtained on application.

Invented by Mr. R. J. PITCHER, Mus. Bac.

Extract from a letter—

"Peterhead, Scotland.

"I have been in the Army five years. After three years without an instrument I obtained this appointment in open competition, and the only practice I had was on a TECHNIQUER. This week my piano arrived. I do not find myself nearly as 'rusty' as I was afraid I should be, and I put it down to my few minutes' daily use of your wonderful little apparatus ERNEST C. EDWARDS."

How to play difficult music with ease. . . .

Pianists who wish to play the music which affords the greatest enjoyment and relaxation—the compositions of the world's greatest musicians—and who are averse to the drudgery of wearisome keyboard practising in order to obtain the necessary technical proficiency, will find the "Brain to Keyboard" method of the greatest possible help.

Practice on this system, much of it away from the keyboard, is never wearisome, and after some weeks of it, spending quite a short time every day, a degree of technical proficiency is obtained which would be otherwise impossible, even after years of keyboard practising for several hours daily.

Sir FREDERICK BRIDGE, C.V.O., has strongly recommended my System, the advantages of which, he stated, he could cordially endorse from his own personal experience. More than 12,000 successful students add their testimony.

"From Brain to Keyboard" Macdonald Smith's System of Pianoforte Playing.

My illustrated book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing," will be gladly sent to any pianist. It fully explains the principles and advantages of the methods used in the System. When applying, please state whether comparative beginner, average or advanced pianist. The book will be sent free of charge, and post free.

LONDON, W.C.1.

CHARLES TREE.

MR. TREE'S RECITAL-LECTURE IS DRAWING PACKED ENTHUSIASTIC HOUSES EVERYWHERE IT IS GIVEN.

SECRETARY, GREENOCK MUSICAL ASSOCIATION, Feb. 16, 1920.—"I have heard so many appreciative references of your last week's Recital-Lecture here, that I cannot refrain from offering congratulations on its undoubted success. The lucid exposition and general treatment of this interesting subject, coupled with the real artistry evidenced in the fifteen song illustrations, mark your lecture as an exceptionally instructive, educative, and entertaining one. It has long been obvious that there is a great field for such a practical exposition of the subtle art of voice-production, and I hope you will be increasingly able to devote a considerable portion of your time to it. My executive are unanimous in the desire that you should give us a repeat performance next session, as they regard your treatment of this subject as being of first importance and eminently useful to all interested in the vocal art."

SOUTHERN, Secretary writes.—"It may interest you to know that everybody, without exception, was absolutely delighted with the evening, and many have expressed the opinion that they have personally benefited by it."

EPSOM, Jan. 22.—"Last evening there were no empty seats. The audience were delighted with the lecture—with its informative nature as regards voice-production and the illustrative singing of Mr. Tree, who lit it up with a humour peculiarly his own."—Herald.

Until teachers and students realise that the great "secret" of voice-production is the simple relation between true speech and singing, that herein lies the simple key to correct vocal placement, to vocal ease, to good enunciation, we shall continue to lose 75 per cent. of our fine young voices as we have been doing for very many years. The tragedies of vocal production brought about by the camouflage so persistent in London to-day is appalling. Lucky the student who happens to be a pupil of one of the very few professors who know the art.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE:

"This Edition of Classic Songs being primarily intended for teaching purposes, a few cuts have been made in excessively long symphonies, and some difficult passages in the accompaniments have been simplified.

"The new English versions of Foreign lyrics aim at being essentially vocal and at rendering the general sense of the originals rather than a pedantic translation."

NEW YORK SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: EUROPEAN TOUR

In our issue of August, 1919,* we announced that an influential committee had been formed for the purpose of inviting the Orchestra of the New York Symphony Society to include this country in its forthcoming European tour. The invitation was most warmly accepted, and good progress is being made with the arrangements.

The Continental tour has assumed proportions undreamt of in April last year, when the French, Italian, and Belgian Governments issued their invitations. A few days ago we had the pleasure of a visit from Mr. George Engles, the Symphony Society's manager, and Mr. Frank M. America, the Director of Information, who had just returned from Paris, where they had been engaged in arranging the itinerary.

'This is a real big thing,' said Mr. Engles, 'bigger than anybody thought it was going to be. We have met with the most cordial of welcomes, and are assured by both private and official circles that every effort will be made to ensure the tour being a tremendous success. The French Minister of Fine Arts, M. Honnorat, has arranged for the Orchestra to receive special facilities on the railways,—for example, the Artists' Tariff, which had been suspended, is to be restored for our benefit. The Minister of Public Works is taking charge of the railway side of the tour, and a very large honorary committee has been formed, with M. Honnorat at its head, and including his entire staff.'

'Have you the practical support of leading French musicians?' we asked.

'Quite,' he replied; 'there is an executive committee of about twenty of the leading conductors and composers; among others, Saint-Saëns, Messager, Chevillard, Rhené-Baton, Georges Hue, Widor, Maurice Ravel, and Roussel.'

'How about the American Colony?'

'They are represented by the American section on the committee of patrons, and are headed by Mr. Hugh Wallace, the American Ambassador.'

'How are the Belgian arrangements progressing?'

'In Belgium, as in France,' he said, 'we find the most eager readiness to do everything possible. At Brussels we met the Minister of Fine Arts, who promised to place at our disposal the Théâtre de la Monnaie. He and our Ambassador, Mr. Brand Whitlock, have agreed to act as co-presidents of the Belgian patrons' committee. From Belgium Mr. America and I went on to Antwerp, Liège, and Ghent, finding at each place most thorough arrangements being made. On our return to Paris we met the Count San Martino, President of the Academy of St. Cecilia at Rome, in whose hands the matter had been placed by the Italian Minister of Fine Arts. The Count was most enthusiastic. Hearing what our French friends were doing for us in the way of railway facilities, he is going to do his best to obtain similar concessions in Italy. I am glad to be able to add that a couple of concerts have been arranged for Amsterdam, on the invitation of a committee similar to yours in London. The tour is now fixed up, and here is the complete list of engagements,' and he handed us the following imposing itinerary:

'All this is excellent,' we said. 'Meanwhile, what of your side of the Atlantic? It takes two parties to make a friendly "do," just as it takes two to make a quarrel.'

'I am glad to be able to say that America is very much stirred by the affair, and for several reasons. In the first place, no American orchestra has ever visited Europe. We have had the pleasure of hearing orchestras from England and the Continent, and are naturally pleased to be able to show you what we can do. Then our musical public is especially gratified that the Continental invitations have come from the various Governments. They regard it as a big step forward that music should be recognized in this way. It is to be hoped that this country and America will soon come into line by appointing Government departments to act in cases of this kind. I may tell you that the matter is very much in the air on our side. In saying this, I don't wish to appear to undervalue the British invitation because it came from a group of private individuals. On the contrary, a special value attaches to a movement set on foot unofficially, because of its spontaneous character, and I can assure you that American musicians very warmly appreciate the action of your committee in coming forward to do what your Government has no machinery for doing.'

'To get back to the American attitude towards the tour,' he continued, 'when the Continental invitations were received in April, Mr. Schwab called a meeting of the directors of the New York Oratorio Society, and it was at once decided to show appreciation of the honour by giving the Orchestra a musical bon voyage—what you call a "send-off"—and it will be a fine send-off, too! There will be a string of six concerts, beginning on Tuesday, April 6. They will take place in the 71st Regiment Armoury—a hall seating about six thousand. It will be the biggest musical Festival ever held in the States. The entire musical direction will be in the hands of Mr. Damrosch, and the Symphony Orchestra will be augmented to a hundred and fifty players. There will be a chorus of fifteen hundred—the Oratorio Society, with the addition of the Bethlehem Bach Choir, of which Mr. Schwab is president. About a couple of dozen of the most prominent soloists will take part. There will be also a children's choir of six hundred, drawn from the New York public schools.'

'What works are down for performance,' we asked.

'I think you will agree that we have a comprehensive programme,' he answered. 'We begin with a work suitable for a big choir and orchestra—"Elijah." The second concert will provide a good contrast, as it will be in honour of Rachmaninoff. We shall give the first American performance of his new Choral Symphony, "The Bells," a setting of Poe's famous poem. We shall give also the first performance of the revised version of his cantata, "Spring-time." Rachmaninoff will play in his second Concerto. At the third concert will be produced a work for chorus and orchestra, "The Pilgrim's Progress," by Edgar Stillman Kelley, one of our representative composers. On the Saturday afternoon there will be a real "star" turn in Brahms's double Concerto for violin and 'cello, with Heifetz and Casals as soloists. We shall include also Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust"—the fortieth anniversary of its first performance in America.

'The festival will end with a choral and orchestral concert, with Tetrizzini as soloist. The last item will be old Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. The Orchestra will steal out as per programme, until only Mr. Damrosch is left, and the chorus will then sing him a farewell song.'

'Where does the children's choir come in?' we asked.

'They get their show chiefly in the "Pilgrim's Progress," which contains choruses for them. Apropos children's choirs,' he went on, 'you English are so keen on this branch of choralism, that you will be interested to hear that splendid work is now being done among our New York school children. We begin to see the importance of catching our musicians young. But this is only one small part of the tremendous musical activity among us. Music is more popular all round than ever it was. The war has done wonders for it. Thousands of men have come into touch with good music for the first time in their lives. For example, our Orchestra went on a tour among the camps, and met with wonderful appreciation. The word "tour" reminds me that the band has always done its share of travelling. We run round to distant cities every spring and summer, and in this way we have covered 250,000 miles in our forty-five years of existence—nearly 6,000 miles each yearly spell. There are only fourteen big symphony orchestras in America, and those few have to hustle to meet all the demands. Mr. Damrosch looks forward to the day when every city of a hundred thousand inhabitants shall have its own orchestra.'

'Same here,' we said, 'but the day is a long way off.'

'Not so far off as you think,' he replied. 'All this recognition of the value of music as a social force means a good deal. Who would have thought a few years ago that international musical visits would be looked on (as they are) as valuable means of promoting understanding and good feeling between the countries concerned? You hear a lot—too much—about anti-British feeling in America, and no doubt you have people here who don't exactly want to fall on our necks—except with a hatchet! We hope that our visit to London will help to do away with some of this antagonism, which is simply the result of not knowing one another well enough. Anyway, the Symphony Orchestra in looking forward to a bully time playing to you, and the more of you we meet, the better for the music and relations of both countries.'

We add the following particulars of a meeting of the Executive Committee, held at 160, Wardour Street, on February 9. Sir Ernest Palmer presided, and there were present the Right Hon. The Lord Mayor of London, Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir Frederic Cowen, Sir Edward Elgar, Mr. Edward German, and Mr. Charles Sheath. The hon. secretary, Mr. Augustus Littleton, stated that he had received letters of regret at unavoidable absence from Earl Howe, Sir Homewood Crawford, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Walter Parratt, Sir Charles Stanford, Sir Henry Wood, Dr. H. P. Allen, and Mr. Landon Ronald.

The chairman proposed that 'This Committee ask the Right Hon. The Lord Mayor of London to honour this movement by permitting his name to be announced as President.' This was seconded by Sir Edward Elgar, and carried unanimously.

The Lord Mayor replied that it would give him great pleasure to accept the position, and he would do his utmost to ensure the success of the scheme. He added that it would afford him gratification to entertain Mr. Damrosch and his party at luncheon at the Mansion House during their visit.

The chairman expressed the committee's hearty thanks to the Lord Mayor for accepting office, and for his kindly suggestion in regard to the entertainment of the Orchestra.

Mr. George Engles, the Society's manager, was then introduced to the committee, and reported on the progress in the arrangements so far made.

After some discussion, during which general surprise was expressed at the magnitude of the scheme, the following resolution, proposed by the Lord Mayor and seconded by the chairman, was carried unanimously:

'That this meeting, having heard from Mr. Engles full particulars of the proposed visit of the New York Symphony Orchestra in June next, pledges itself to do all in its power to make the suggested concerts a success.'

The meeting then terminated.

THREE STORIES AND A MORAL: A PROBLEM FOR TEACHERS

BY ALFRED KALISCH

Here are three true stories. Each has its moral, and the three morals seem to be at variance. The problem is to bring them into agreement. It can be done with a little common-sense and a healthy determination to test the value of conventions without fear or favour.

The first story is this: A good many years ago I was asked to look at some compositions by a friend of a composer. I received a bundle of beautifully-written music, with Opus numbers ranging from 100 to 200. It was Weber, Spohr, Mendelssohn, with a touch of 'Lohengrin,' and all in the strictest form. 'An elderly gentleman,' I thought to myself, 'perhaps a country organist who has heard no modern music.' A few days later I saw the composer. To my surprise he was a mere lad. He lived in a country town, and had seen and heard nothing newer than 'Lohengrin.' He was duly trained, and now he is famous and quite modern. Apparent moral: the old music is the only solid foundation for the new.

Story No. 2. Some years ago a girl composer appeared in London, and played some very charming and promising music. It was very like early Scriabin and Tchaikovsky. It was discovered that she did not know much about the classics. Apparent moral: why worry about the classics?

Story No. 3. A friend of mine, himself a composer of modern music, but with a strict classical education, has musical children. They cannot endure anything earlier than the later Wagner. Tonic and dominant are to them as red rags to a bull. Apparent moral: the same as No. 2, only more so.

Here is a pretty problem for teachers. Should they force a pupil to do what he obviously does not like, or should they allow him to follow his inclination? Respectability and tradition say the first is the only way. Common-sense says the second, and warns us that insistence on the first makes many musical children hate music, or gives their teachers the mistaken idea that they are unmusical.

A great many teachers are following the second and wiser plan; but they are often obliged to hide it from anxious parents, who think it subversive of musical morality. They employ subterfuge, and suggest that the modern music is merely by way of 'preparatory exercises.' It is time that the second plan was openly followed, and with a clear understanding why it is right.

It is admitted by authorities on education that the child of to-day is psychologically and physiologically very different from the child of fifty years ago. In other branches of teaching, practice is based on recognition of this truth. Why not in music?

Analogies in such matters are not the safest guides, but a comparison with the teaching of literature may be of some help. We are told by the upholders of the older method that we should not let a child start his literary training on Swinburne or Rupert Brooke, but on Shakespeare. Even admitting—and it is a large admission—that this is inevitably right in all cases, we see that the analogy breaks down. A child starts his specific literary training with a large store of knowledge of contemporary idiom, which helps him to understand the English of three centuries ago. Moreover, the average child of the educated classes from his earliest years hears the English of the Authorized Version and the Prayer Book, and, presumably, listens to it with attention; and therefore the idiom of Shakespeare is not wholly a closed book.

A child with no previous musical knowledge, who is taken straight to the composers of the 18th century, is confronted with something quite unintelligible, which makes him uncomfortable, and to which he is impervious. It may be said that unless he comes of a musical family he probably will not know modern music either; but experience shows that the child of to-day is drawn to modern music automatically. I know a musical child who at the age of ten took to Puccini as a duck takes to water, and looked upon 'Figaro' as a horrid lesson, to the despair of her teacher, who suspected her of a double dose of original sin. Now, however, at the age of about seventeen, she is beginning to be reconciled to four-bar phrases, full closes and repeats, and to love Mozart. Had she been forced to listen to Mozart and play Mozart at ten, she would by now have been a confirmed music hater.

We must, in short, recognise that love of the music of to-day is the first stage, love of the classics the second. The story of the individual does not move in the same way as the history of the world. It used to be an article of pedagogic faith that both started from the same point and followed the same path.

It is not necessary to pause long to consider how this comes about. Many explanations are possible. The children of parents who thought Gluck impossibly noisy cannot have inherited the same auditory nerves as the children of those to whom a Tchaikovsky fortissimo is a normal experience—to say nothing of an air-raid barrage or the hooting of a motor bus. Fathers and mothers to whom 'Tristan' is the height of euphony cannot transmit the same harmonic sense as men and women who thought the 'Eroica' discordant.

The new method—as I call it for the sake of brevity—imposes a heavy task on teachers. They must select with care; they must know how to avoid all that is vulgar and meretricious. Adherence to the old masters saved them the trouble, but it is not the ideal of education to invent labour-saving devices for teachers. There is abundance of good teaching-music being written in discreetly modern idiom, and lists of it are not lacking.

Let no one accuse me of suggesting an exclusive diet of Scriabin, Stravinsky, or Lord Berners, or neglect of the classics in musical education. On the contrary, to my mind nothing is more deplorable than the ignorance of some musicians of things like the '48' or the Beethoven Sonatas and Quartets. Were I rich, the first thing I should do would be to endow prizes for Bach-playing all over the country. I am not pleading for a displacement of the classics, but for a systematic attempt to discover in the case of each pupil—whether destined for a musical career or not—what is the proper place for them when the ground has been properly prepared.

It is not possible always to agree with Sir Thomas Beecham, especially when it pleases him to pose as martyred by a malignant Press; but when he said, as he did some years ago, that the classics are best approached by way of the moderns, he spoke words of wisdom. I freely admit that at the time I thought it was a blazing indiscretion.

MODERN BRITISH COMPOSERS

By EDWIN EVANS

The Phantasy String Quartet, which also belongs to 1916, was written for Mr. Cobbett's Folk-Song competition, with the reservation that authentic folk-songs were not used but only the idiom related to them. Its atmosphere is a blend of open-air breeziness with the mystic remoteness to which we have referred in the earlier portion of this article. Of the former, the following may serve as an example:

PHANTASY QUARTET—Op. 25.

The remoter mood is less easy to illustrate. Its very nature almost precludes definition, but for comparison one may turn to the concluding section of the first Violin Sonata, to the end of the first movement in the second Violin Sonata, and to a characteristic episode of the Clarinet Quintet.

Howells's output for 1917 includes the Sarum Sketches for pianoforte—written whilst he was assistant-organist at Salisbury, around the wistful personality of a very lonely choir-boy—three pieces for strings, and a Violin Sonata in one movement. Of the string pieces, the most important is the Elegy (Op. 15), which was performed at the Mons Memorial Concert. As already stated, it is dedicated to the memory of 'Bunny' of the 'B's,' who was lost in the war, and it deals affectionately with the personality covered by that endearing name. Hence it belongs to the most intimate kind of music, the extreme opposite of the heroic vein which would have been more appropriate for the Albert Hall Concert at which it was performed, the building itself being unfavourable to such searching introspection. The entire musical thought clusters round one theme:

ELEGY FOR STRINGS—Op. 15.

Ex. 2. lento, assai espressivo.

The Violin Sonata in E major was described at its first performance as a Phantasy Sonata, but the composer has very wisely dropped this description, which in fact describes nothing. In form it is a sonata in one movement, and that is its only right designation. But there is much phantasy in the contents, which might well serve as musical illustration to a fairy tale—with a sad end, and perhaps a little long in the telling. The calmer portions are the most impressive, and particularly the concluding pages, which take the listener's imagination far away from realities into a dim world where everything becomes credible.

The second Violin Sonata, in E flat, was written the following year, and first performed in February, 1919. It is a work of strongly individual character, in the traditional four movements. The lyrical nature of the composer's inspiration is perhaps more convincingly shown here than in any other of his instrumental works. Save in their slow movements, the great majority of violin sonatas are really declamatory. The declamation may vary in character, but it is a recitative that seldom bursts into song. In this sonata one might almost say that the opposite is the case, for the song is seldom allowed to drop into recitative, and then only by way of contrast. On the last page of the first movement occurs the following:

VIOLIN AND PIANOFORTE SONATA in E♭—Op. 20.

Ex. 3. quasi lento, con sord.

which is very typical both of the work itself and of a mood to which we have more than once made reference. The slow movement and the Scherzo, although contained within a formal outline, show an unusual freedom of style. It is possible that one or the other will not please everybody, but none can gainsay that here, at least, is a composer who speaks his mind. The Lento, in particular, has beauty of a kind that one cannot discuss—one either feels it or one does not. But it will be the mood rather than the mood-picture that settles the question.

During the same year, the composer began the series of Four Rhapsodies for organ which are at present attracting much attention from players of that instrument. The organ is a hard taskmaster. Perhaps that, and its demand for absolute harmonic truth, without compromise, are the reasons why so little really original organ music makes its appearance nowadays in comparison with the almost perplexing variety of styles in other fields. There is thus special significance in the fact that Howells's harmonic personality, if one may use the expression, shows as clearly in this medium as in any other that he has employed. There is, of course, a certain reticence imposed by the instrument itself, but that only makes the result more striking. In each of the Rhapsodies, but especially in the third, there are episodes revealing an invention that could have no other source.

Last year was extraordinarily productive—so fertile in fact as to inspire a word of caution. Happily the level of quality has not suffered by it. The familiar 'Puck's Minuet' which is included in Op. 20 is really a year or two older, but its appearance opened the year very auspiciously, for it has become the most frequently performed of its composer's works. The most characteristic composition of the year was however the Rhapsodic Quintet in one movement for clarinet, two violins, viola, and 'cello. It would be possible to illustrate an article on Herbert Howells almost with this work alone, for, although it nowhere offends against the laws of unity, it passes through his most characteristic moods, and employs many of those devices which bear the stamp of his personality, such as the tapestry weaving of themes, the rhythmic elaboration, and the employment of harmonies which, without being strictly modal, convey a modal flavour. It might almost be regarded as a summary of his development at this stage. Of the two examples we quote, the first:

is a striking instance of a theme which, after having entered unobtrusively a little earlier, reappears in a rhythmic setting which gives it melodic prominence. The other example:

belongs to a mystic episode which heralds the approach of one of those calm endings in which Howells delights, and in the treatment of which he almost invariably achieves the happiest results.

From a number of miscellaneous compositions which made their appearance about the same time, we might select the pianoforte pieces, Op. 14, the third of which, 'Procession,' has been awarded the prize recently offered by Mr. York Bowen. It takes the form of a long crescendo and decrescendo with the following for its climax:

Then there are four settings of French folk-songs belonging to the répertoire of Mlle. Raymonde Collignon. There has been much discussion of late, in which the writer has taken part, concerning the degree of freedom permissible in this form of art. Howells is of those who consider that a song, if deemed worthy to endure, should be clothed as a living thing and not in antiquated garments. In his setting of 'La Légende de Ste. Catherine' he has produced an argument that should convince all but the irreconcilables. Another vocal work is 'Peacock Pie,' an objective vision of childhood that might be held to have some relation to Moussorgsky's 'Enfantes.' Finally, Howells has contributed a 'Phantasy Minuet' to the series which the Æolian Company has in preparation, consisting of works composed directly for the resources of the pianola.

His most recent composition is the String Quartet 'In Gloucestershire,' which belongs to his most 'English' vein. It is in four movements, picturesque in character, though not necessarily suggestive of definite scenes, and expressive of the open-air mood with all that it connotes—of boisterousness in one direction and of meditation in another. The writing develops naturally and logically on the one hand from Opp. 21 and 25, and on the other from the elaborations characteristic of Op. 31. As an instance, the form of rhythmic device illustrated in Ex. 4 finds its counterpart in the spirit, though outwardly perhaps in a less complicated aspect.

This ends for the present our survey of a composer whose output is remarkable for his years. Under some conditions the plentifulness might occasion misgivings, but this is not a case of hothouse production or any other form of intensive culture. It results in large measure from the combination of an enforced dwelling amid rural surroundings, and a mind with a natural bent for poetic meditation. This latter quality is not of the kind that would profit more by silence than by expression. Being essentially lyrical, it is almost compelled to sing. Hence there is no sign either of fatigue or of attenuation in the musical thought such as would lead one to diagnose overproduction. Howells is too young for us to hazard elaborate conjectures concerning his future; Let the present suffice. In the list which follows are some half-dozen works of outstanding artistic value and interest, and in touching upon them we have by no means exhausted the subject. One serious omission of which the writer is conscious is the absence of any reference to the composer's settings of Latin texts for the Church.

Bach's early shortcomings as a fugal writer are most fully exposed in the long work in A minor, beginning on page 208 of vol. x. It bears obvious traces of Buxtehude's influence, especially in its looseness of structure and thematic poverty. We are so accustomed to find Bach improving on his model, that we get something like a shock when he falls short of it, as he certainly does here. The work consists of an introduction, a fugue, an interlude, a second fugue on two subjects, and a lengthy Coda in the style of the opening. Such a chaotic scheme can be made tolerable only by first-rate subjects, well treated; and it must be confessed that for once Bach's inventive powers are unequal to the occasion. To make matters worse, the second fugue has no connection with what has gone before—a departure from Buxtehude's practice.

Bach seems to have realised too late the need for unity, and apparently tried to save the situation by rounding off the work with a Coda in the style of the opening. But the material in both cases is too vague to make any impression, and the result is a work which must be regarded as a complete failure—a long effort with no redeeming feature.

Almost as bad is the Fantasia and Fugue in the same key (xii., 60). Its one good point is the excellent subject of the fugue—a foreshadowing of that of the great A minor Fugue written in the composer's prime. The Fantasia is mere passage-work of the most desolating description; the fugue sticks badly at times, and gives us thin passage-work where we expect to find episodes. To crown all, when the fugue is over Bach reels off about forty bars of cadenza as uninteresting as the fifty with which he began.

Weak, too, though in a different way, is the Fugue in D (xii., 83). Far too much use is made of a sequence that was probably well-worn even before the youthful Bach found it handy as a stop-gap.

Much better is a Fugue in G (xii., 86), which, in spite of a little complacent padding, maintains the naive freshness promised by the subject:

The Prelude in C which follows is usually ascribed to this period, but its style, the use of the pedal, and the material of bars 24-27 (especially in regard to the augmented sixth) seem to point to a much later date. Is it by Bach? There is a strong flavour of the Krebs and Kittle tribe, especially in the last dozen bars.

Two Fantasias, both in G, and both consisting of three sections, also belong to this period. The simpler—and apparently earlier—of the two (xii., 75), deals with a subject of Kuhnau; though it seems odd to speak of ownership in the case of such a simple series of notes as:

This is treated with a thin kind of fluency for seventy-one bars—which is about thirty too many—a full close on B leading to a brief Adagio in E minor on an inversion of the theme.

The third part of the work is the only one that is worth the player's attention. It is an effective Allegro, treating in Chaconne fashion a descending scale-passage of six notes, derived of course from the original theme. The writing is flowing and vigorous, and the movement makes a capital voluntary, especially where there is an ample pedal organ on which the theme can stalk with plenty of weight. It is a pity that this Allegro seems to be overlooked by teachers. It is one of the best of the early works for technical purposes.

The other Fantasia is the well-known work with the five-voice middle section (ix., 168). It opens with twenty-eight bars of bravura for the mantal. Such passages are usually an infliction on all but the player, but the one under notice is far more interesting than the average because of its coherence and the clearness with which it suggests a natural and effective harmonic scheme. How are we to register it? The Novello edition suggests soft 8-ft. and 4-ft. Choir stops—a safe plan. Dr. Hull advises the use of full Swell without reeds, going on to the Great 8-ft. and 4-ft. a few bars before the Grave. He adds: 'A more picturesque rendering may be obtained from the Swell flues.' The Widor-Schweitzer edition gives foundation stops and mixtures on two uncoupled manuals, with a very complex system of manual changes to bring out the 'natural echo effects in the music itself.' The player is recommended to change at every bar from 1 to 18, 'playing the odd measures on the Great organ, the even measures on Choir or Swell, and striking the first note of each even measure on both Great and subsidiary manual together.' In measure 19 we are told to change between the even and odd quarters. Surely this is overdoing things! A skilful use of the swell pedal can do a lot for those 'natural echo effects' without disturbing the rapid flow which is clearly the first requirement. The suggestions I have quoted are evidently based on the assumption that pace is not the thing to be aimed at, for a note says: 'Do not be seduced by the *très vite*ment into playing the wonderful passages in the Introduction too fast.' But Bach so rarely employs terms of this kind that when he does they mean a great deal. Better advice would be: 'Do not be seduced by complicated registration or editorial fads into disregarding Bach's plain desire for a very lively pace. Rattle it off as fast as your fingers and the acoustical properties of the building will allow.' The Grave is perhaps best played with plenty of diapason tone at the start, adding from time to time until the full power is brought on at the final discord. Make the most of the splendid rising pedal scale of two octaves beginning at bar 129, adding pedal reeds or even coupling a powerful stop from the solo manual. If you have no reeds bring the left-foot on to the DD at bar 136 and play octaves until the top D. Never mind if the mounting bass kills the manual parts for a few bars as it reaches its climax. We may regard this passage as an early hint at a fine modern effect—a theme apparently of no importance gradually emerging from the background and dominating the situation. (A splendid example in organ music is to be found in Franck's Choral in E, wherein what appears to be a mere pendant to the group of themes with which the work opens gradually takes the upper hand. As Franck said of it, 'You will see the real Choral grow out of the work').

The Grave contains some fine polyphony, though it is a good deal less mature in style than some writers appear to find it. We have only to compare its five-part writing with that of the 'St. Anne' fugue, or the Kyrie, 'Gott heiliger Geist' in the 'Clavierübung' (xvi., 33), or with the six-part 'Aus tiefer Noth' (xvi., 68), to see what a long way Bach had yet to go before attaining easy mastery in such things. In this early work the parts too often run into one another, and such details as this tenor flourish:

are not only out of the picture, but, being in an inner part, are ineffective and merely confuse the issue. Moreover, the young composer had not yet learned the importance of resting a voice. In keeping the five going without break he is not always able to give each one something worth saying.

There is a small textual matter calling for note. Bar 110 appears in the Novello edition as:

Peters and Schweitzer-Widor give B natural bass and B flat alto. Dr. Hull does the same, but hedges by putting a flat in brackets over the bass B natural. Common practice in the treatment of the sixth of the minor scale, ascending and descending, points clearly to the bass being natural and the alto flat.

The cadenza with which the Fantasia closes calls for louder treatment than the opening; but here again we must be guided by our organ and building. Parry says the series of chords here presented is 'rather obvious.' It may be so, but the laying-out of the arpeggios and the use of auxiliary notes are surely very far ahead of anything else in contemporary work. Good as these bravura sections are, however, they are so dwarfed by the Grave as to seem impertinent. It is a pity we do not play this great middle part alone as a voluntary. All we have to do to make it complete in itself is to substitute a tonic chord for the discord at the end. We then have a noble monologue which will arrest the departing faithful, whereas the *très vite*ment opening will merely hurry them, besides being much too light-hearted for use immediately after a service.

The long four-movement work in C* (viii., 88), sometimes called Toccata, is curiously disappointing, although it shows no small advance in grasp of form and in the technique of writing. Bach has again gone to Buxtehude for a model, and the construction is on approved lines—a free prelude, a fugue, and a second free passage, leading to a new fugue on a derivative of the subject of the first. The preludial matter is good enough in its way, a mixture of big chords, suspensions, and manual passage-work: the kind of thing the organists of that day improvised readily enough, no doubt. When the pedal becomes animated it shows Bach still not quite comfortable in writing for it. Not till he had assimilated Italian influences did he consistently write those flowing basses that still delight us—basses which owe much to the strings and very little to the northern organ composers, who hardly ever got beyond zigzag versions of the scale and simple passages based on the arpeggio of the common chord.

* It appears also in E, but there seems to be little doubt that C is the original key.

The chief disappointment in this work is the first fugue. The subject has two bad faults: it is too long and it is monotonous:

EX. 5.

Compare this inane ambling down the scale with the brief, pregnant themes from which the later Bach developed some of the greatest things in music. The little semiquaver twirl becomes a sore trial as the fugue goes on—its seven times at each appearance of the subject seem almost like seventy times seven. A good deal of monotony is due to the limited key scheme. Of the twelve entries of the subject, only one gets away from the tonic and dominant; and even that does no more than venture into the relative minor. The chattering, repeated notes at the beginning of the subject are a northern convention to which we shall find Bach sticking more or less until his maturity. We may be thankful that he dropped it in time to save us from a 'St. Anne' fugue beginning:

EX. 6.

There is some charm about the final fugue of this work, but it is thinly spread, and we have a dreadful drop into inanity at the Coda. Such a pedal solo as:

EX. 7.

is enough to qualify any movement for the shelf.

Unfortunately for Bach's fame, too many players and teachers cannot, or will not, see the poverty of the work as a whole. Perhaps they too readily swallow the laudatory opinion of Spitta, who calls it 'all but a perfect masterpiece.' The editors of the Novello edition go even farther, including it in the same volume with the 'Wedge,' the great Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, and two other of the best works, and speaking of the group as 'five of Bach's masterpieces.' Parry is more critical, finding the first fugue subject 'very long and rather monotonous,' and the figures of the bravura passages 'rather mild and commonplace.' Both fugues, especially the second, 'are wanting in decisiveness of personality.' Mr. Heathcote Statham* throws an interesting sidelight on the curious esteem in which the work has been held in England. He tells us that the Bach Society, when arranging their initial festival in the composer's honour, at first ignored the organ works. On public protest being made they included one, the choice falling on this immature specimen! Mr. Statham says that a well-known musician who was with him at the concert told him that when he was studying in Germany his teacher advised him to neglect the work, as it was not worth serious attention.

I dwell on this point at some length because it helps us to understand how the words 'Bach' and 'Fugue' were until lately regarded as synonyms for dullness. And if I seem to insist overmuch on the faults of these early works, it is by way of protest against our uncritical attitude towards Bach as toward other classical composers. It is still easy to find young organists reaching the end of their pupillage knowing little or nothing about the most subtle and individual of all Bach's works—the Choral Preludes. They have spent precious hours grinding at such dull and immature works as the one we have been considering—works containing no technical material that cannot be found elsewhere in abundance, and which bear pretty much the same relation to the composer's representative output as Beethoven's Sonatina in G minor does to the 'Appassionata.' Art is so long, and life so short, that we ought not to spend time studying anything but the best. Every time we are influenced by the name on the title-page rather than by the music within, we do an injustice to ourselves, to the composer, and to some other composer whose more worthy work is thereby pushed aside.

The Prelude and Fugue in C in vol. vii., page 74, is another work that has more performances than it deserves. It opens with one of the worst pedal solos ever written—bar after bar of C major arpeggios. Things improve when the manuals get going, but it is all very primitive. The fugue contains some vigorous writing, and there is a general atmosphere of high spirits induced by the heavily-playful subject and a good deal of its treatment. But, on the whole, the pupil can easily find in the Choral Preludes work of a corresponding degree of difficulty and of infinitely greater value as music. It is amusing to note that Spitta, after speaking of the 'massive character of the chords, the effective and brilliant close, and the freedom of the part-writing,' says that 'the effect of this work when well-played, and upon an organ of adequate power, is quite extraordinary. Throughout we hear the roar of the wind, as in a stormy night of March, and we feel that such power is irresistible.'

EX. 8.

* 'The Organ and its Position in Musical Art,' page 98.

Roughly speaking, we may say that Bach's 'prentice period ended with the works we have so far dealt with. In 1707 he went to Mulhausen, where he stayed about a year before accepting the offer of a post at the Court of Weimar. Here he remained nine years, during which period he wrote a group of his most brilliant and popular works.

BY ARTHUR L. SALMON

We have become familiar with music that claims to be many different things—not only scenic or descriptive, but psychological and metaphysical: in fact music which claims to be what it cannot be. There is interest and perhaps value in this, as illustrating the temper and spirit of our times. It is one among the age's many attempts at self-utterance; yet it can hardly be other than a transition. Men are seeking to discover and to express the undiscoverable and the inexpressible; and music, unlike painting or the plastic arts, allows itself to be called anything you like. At the same time it is the art most insusceptible to the imposition of names. On examining such music we find a number of attractive labellings, and perhaps the labels suggested the music; it is certain that the music does not suggest the labels. I have seen a short composition by an enthusiast entitled 'Everlasting Truth,' but I did not find everlasting truth comprised and expressed within its bars; I found only a confirmation of my suspicion that such truth is not easy to attain and is less easy to express. Nor was I assisted by the composer when he assured me that he 'sought to realise the rock-like severely simple basis that it always appears to me must underly the Everything—simple and severe as the wonderful throes of conception.' It seemed to me that his artistic efforts in an entirely wrong direction had led to a sad confusion of metaphor; for surely throes are not often rock-like and are not always simple. If even words go astray in such a connection, what must we expect of music, whose genius it is to be entirely indefinite and entirely averse from labelling?

In a different direction, there are now those who assert that music can be identified with Colour. Such identification may not be quite an idle fantasy—it is certain that particular keys, particular tones, suggest colour to some listeners. It is the glory of music that its suggestive power is unlimited, and though it can never be pictorial it can undoubtedly suggest pictures to those whose imagination runs to vision. But such pictures are never arbitrarily established; they always depend on the listener. And surely any arbitrary identifying of music with special colours is merely a confusion of symbolisms; it is converting sound into a symbol of something seen, and that something seen into a symbol of a mood. It is true that there may be something physiologically correct in identifying colour with special mental conditions; it is perhaps no mere figure of speech which says that in anger or in alarm we 'see red'; it is certain that greens and greys and special shades of blue are soothing and consoling. Physicians have discovered that particular rays are curative, that colours have their use in the treatment of mania. We know sufficiently well the value of light, and colour itself is nothing but light. All this belongs to exact science, and is verifiable. Colour is the differentiated vibration of light; sound is the differentiated vibration of air. Scientific confusion of the two is impossible; they reach, and are received by, different senses.

Music, which can suggest anything, can of course suggest colour. It will do so according to the receptivity of the listener, and such receptivity, such translation in receiving, varies with every individual. To speak of a colour-tone is correct, because we have given the word tone this extended meaning. Language is not rich enough to do without these amplifications; but while we may speak of a colour's tone, we are surely committing an absurdity if we speak of a colour's sound. It is obvious that when we refer to tone or note in colour we are not thinking of sound at all; yet those who are now talking of colour in music are actually referring to a definite colouring, they are giving concrete form to that which at most can only be a vague analogy. They would give to each composer his own distinctive mood-colour, or shall we say temperament-colour. Thus I was seriously informed by a lady, not long since, that Debussy's temperament-colour (and, incidentally, her own) is blue. I had previously thought of the French composer as a musical mystic rather than as a colorist. I now inferred that he should be played in a blue-papered room, with a bluish twilight stealing in at blue-curtained windows. The idea has a certain charm; but it is too arbitrary, too emphatic and definite, to please me; and if my own mood-colour happened not to be blue, the effect might be disastrous. Blue is a most satisfying colour in some of its gradations; yet when I say that I am feeling 'blue' I mean that I feel depressed, and it is conceivable that a large supply of specifically blue music might be profoundly depressing. I am not making the composer responsible for all this; my lady friend may be more Debussiste than Debussy himself. But I forgot to question her about the temperamental colours of other composers—is it red, or yellow, or green? I did not ask her if the really greatest might not be considered complete rainbows. To attribute one especial colour to each seems a limitation. Red suggests danger, irritation, anarchy; to be 'done brown' does not suggest music at all; to speak of yellow music unhappily suggests the Yellow Press.

Of course it is easy to poke fun at these confusions of phraseology, and to do so is not argument. There is enough truth in their idea to deserve fairer treatment. It is quite true that the prevalent characteristic of a mood or temperament may be suggested in terms of colour; we do so constantly in daily conversation, as when we talk of seeing red, feeling blue, looking green. This is an entirely justifiable use of language; but is it equally justifiable to say that a thing sounds red, sounds green, sounds yellow? It is also true that sound may suggest a particular mood, and that mood may suggest a particular colour. A blue tie or a blue painting will appear blue to all who are not colour-blind. Does it follow that if Debussy does not suggest blue to a hearer, that hearer is musically colour-blind? Can we limit musical suggestion by any such arbitrary distinctions? Blue is a word singularly rich in resources: but in the name of goodness what is pink music and what is yellow? Can we say 'I feel in a violet or a scarlet mood to-day, and I want violet or scarlet music'? It may be urged that this is a reductio ad absurdum; yet after all the questions are severely logical. The error undoubtedly lies in confounding the terminology of different arts; it is akin to those other errors of confusing music with philosophy, with draughtsmanship, with definition. Those whose spiritual impressions come to them in colour are justified in receiving any colour-suggestions they choose from the music they hear; we need not even say 'choose,' for probably they cannot help themselves. But they must not mistake the particular for the general, nor lay down a colour-scheme of music for all. It simply will not do. Music is too big a thing for that. What about a hearer born blind? He will receive the mood readily enough; none can hear music more completely and satisfyingly; but he must surely lose the colour-impressions. We need a broader and less definite phraseology when we would speak of the infinite suggestiveness of music. We need no labels that shall be limitations. And we must divorce ourselves from the idea that differences of music-tonality can be rigidly denoted by colour-symbols, by formulæ borrowed from any other art. Even the mind's eye cannot be absolutely depended on to see a distinct colour in music; and to say that the mind's ear hears colour is manifestly a misuse of words.

Arrangements for the Handel Festival (June 19, 22, 24, 26) are well in hand. There is little doubt that the choir will be at the desired strength—2,500. It will, however, facilitate the work of organization if intending singers will apply at once (stating voice) to Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock, Musical Director, Crystal Palace, S.E. We hope to give details of the arrangements in our April number.

Interludes

By 'FESTE'

The visit of the Ukrainian Choir was very interesting, not only because of the performances, but because of some sidelights it shed on the difference between the choral ideals of this country and those of the Continent. The choir is undoubtedly a first-rate one, particularly in the matter of discipline, but it is not so good that we cannot produce a dozen better. I begin by saying this, because one noted as usual a tendency to compare the visitors with the average British choir, and to shake heads over our fancied inferiority. Comparisons in such cases are always difficult, because it is obvious that a picked choir, touring, and singing a rather limited repertory—limited especially in regard to style—can reach a perfection in drill and ensemble unattainable by an even better body working under ordinary conditions. But even so I heard nothing at either of the concerts to put me out of conceit with any of our best choral forces. To compare the Ukrainians with any but our best is of course absurd. We may be sure that if the Sheffield Choir or the Welsh Choral Union went touring in the Ukraine the natives would not start judging their local choirs by the standard of the visitors. Yet that was the uncritical attitude of some Londoners.

The difference between our choral standard and style and that of France has long been apparent to those of us who have heard French choirs, and especially to such of us as were present at the Paris International Competitions in 1912, and so were able to hear French and British choirs side by side. But the difference could not be better realised than by a glance at the two pages of French press opinions on the Ukrainians quoted at the end of the programme of the Queen's Hall concerts. Thus:

No doubt we have many voices over here which are as excellent as those of the Ukrainian singers. But who could group them here, educate them, and obtain from them such a rendering?—Excelsior, Paris.

Let us humble ourselves and admit that no choral performances of ours could equal that which we have just been admiring.—Le Ménestrel.

And George Pierfitte in the Toulouse La Dépêche, after saying 'I feel unable to convey my impressions of the concerts in mere words,' proceeds to make a courageous attempt. From the three hundred mere words he manages to find useful, I quote the following (the italics are not mine):

From the very beginning, one loses all notion of space and time; one forgets the prosaic hall; one imagines oneself to be in some sacred temple, and assisting at the performance of some marvellous and hitherto unknown rites of Eternal Beauty.

We no longer witness ordinary singers obeying their conductor; these are priests and priestesses of a deep Religion; reverently bent before a Demiurge, who projects and transmits his own flame with eloquent and dominating gestures, by turns impressive, tragic, wrathful, or imploring. He plays, so to say, on a magnificent human instrument, whose sixty hearts and sixty brains are connected in a telepathic and mysterious correspondence with his heart and brain.

What a discipline! What a submission to the idea which is felt to hover above these unique performers! What a marvellous precision! What purity! What nuances! Never a hitch in the most daring rhythms, not the slightest hesitation in the most difficult passages. And then what poise and what perfect homogeneity! Everything is mingled in unique sonorousness, giving sometimes the impression of an ideally harmonious organ.

From which we may safely assume that first-rate choral singing is not a common object on the seashore at Toulouse.

Perhaps the most picturesque criticism is that signed 'Presto' in L'Echo du soir, Antwerp:

The Ukrainian Song is Beauty in its entire nudity which does not blush yet from having tasted the withering fruits of the tree of Knowledge.

As a matter of fact the music sung, though simple folk-song essentially, was served up in far too sophisticated a style to be fairly described as Beauty 'mit nodings on.' It had a good deal on, and very skilful and attractive dressing most of it was.

Returning to the question of standard, can you imagine any English critic of repute being able honestly to say what was said in Excelsior and Le Ménestrel?

The difference between the choral ideals of the two countries is well shown by the fact that practically all the comment one heard at Queen's Hall began by complaining of the shrill quality in the loud singing, especially on the part of the sopranos. But French and Belgian critics seemed to find nothing amiss on that score—at all events no complaint appears in the quotations. We need not attach much importance to the absence of such complaint in the quotations, for even in this country people have been known to quote only the jammy parts of notices. But it reminds us that on no point do we differ more than on this question of tone. A French choir gives one the impression that its motto is, 'Take care of the interpretation and the tone will take care of itself.' Until about fifteen years ago English choralists—or, rather, their conductors—went to the other extreme and made a fetish of tone, taking as their model the round and pleasing, though somewhat colourless, flue work of the organ. There was only one kind of tone for every kind of song, and it was of the type known as 'good'—that is to say, smooth and round. Thanks to the great advance made on the interpretative side of choral singing, we now see that good tone is the tone that best expresses the character of the song, and it follows that in certain circumstances pure round tone may not be good but bad. If our choral singing is second to none, as most good judges think, it is because our leading conductors now maintain that a choir should employ as many varieties of tone-colour as we expect from a good solo singer. Obviously, however, the norm should be of a type that does not weary the ear. In an orchestra the only section to which we can listen for an unlimited time is that of the strings. In an organ the diapason tone wears the best. The choral equivalent of these is the purely musical tone on which trainers of the older school set such store. Now the French choirs, like the Ukrainians, have very little tonal variety. Their loud singing is invariably hard and shrill, and their quality is pleasing to English ears only in the quieter passages. Let me hasten to admit, however, that as each of the Ukrainian concerts proceeded I found the shrill and acid quality less and less annoying, until by the end of the second programme I began to understand Continental people finding our round tone dull and colourless. This naturally leads to the question, Do our English choirs make sufficient use of thin tone? We had a striking instance of its value when two of the sopranos sang a brief antiphonal solo passage. The tone of the first may be likened to that of an oboe, and the second to that of a flute. The result was an excellent effect that so far we never hear save from an orchestra. We may be sure that two sopranos in an English choir would have sounded so much alike that the effect would have been merely that of a tame repetition by the first singer. This was one of several moments wherein the Ukrainians gave us little glimpses of colour schemes that would never be tolerated by English conductors simply because one or more of the singers concerned were producing so-called 'bad tone.'

Such moments seemed to me to point the way to some interesting possible developments. We enjoy the acidity of the oboe and cor Anglais so long as we get it in small doses; why should we object to the choral use of such astringent effects for exceptional passages?

This brings us to a matter of which much was made in the somewhat hysterical paragraphs which preceded the Ukrainians. We were told that the choir was a kind of orchestra as well, the members imitating violins and trumpets. One paper even gave us a picture of three of the women, alleging that they did the violin passages. If there were any such imitations they passed unnoticed. Indeed critics and others expressed relief that the singing had been of the 'straight' order, and free from 'stunts.' This is really a bit of mild humbug, because if there had been imitations of the kind, they would have been merely an extension of a practice already approved in all but the severest circles. Does anybody object to the Sheffield Choir's performance of 'The Bells of St. Michael's Tower' on the ground that it includes some very skilfully contrived imitations of jangling and booming bells? And the same choir has frequently given successful bouche fermée imitations of strings and the 'pang pang' on a banjo.

The banjo has such flippant associations that we need not consider it, but there are various wind instruments that will some day attract the attention of choral composers. The soft notes of the horn can be copied by any male voice so easily that I sometimes wonder why the players of the instrument do not quietly hoot some of the simpler passages, instead of blowing them—generally with at least one cracked note. The imitation would be at least free from those little explosions that we have come to expect every time we see the players preparing for action. Tenors could easily copy the upper register of the bassoon (some do so already without meaning to), and any real bass would find no difficulty in the tearing lower notes. The women would of course manage the flute, piccolo, oboe and clarinet. Strings need very little development of the bouche fermée singing. The bagpipe (which we Scotsmen regard as a musical instrument) has already been successfully reproduced in choral arrangements of folk-songs.

I had better make it clear right here and now that my suggestions are serious. Those of you who scoff may be reminded of the difference between what is now called the 'new choralism' and that of twenty years ago. Do you remember the headshaking when Coward first made the Demons' Chorus in 'Gerontius' sound as if it were being sung not by a gathering of sidesmen and Sunday School teachers, but by a pack of quite another order of being? Now the headshaking follows the old 'good tone' style of performance. And who to-day would expect a choir to sing 'He trusted in God' with the same vocal colour as 'And the glory,' or the beginning of 'All we like sheep' in the same style as the end? As was said above, we look to a first-rate chorus to give us as much vivid characterisation as we get from our best soloists.

The newest choralism will leave the percussion instruments alone, with one exception—the drum. The side-drum is very easily imitated by a rapid vibration of the tip of the tongue, the lips being pursed and slightly parted. An excellent feature of this imitation is its possibilities in the matter of nuance. We may reproduce not only the rattling roll of the instrument, but also the crescendo which is one of its most striking effects. Those of you who have heard ‘The Drum Major’ sung by certain of our baritones will remember that the tarara-ra-ra in the text is given in the realistic manner described above. It cannot be expressed by signs, so we shall go on writing tarara or simply indicating a trill. I hope a choral writer will soon give us an arrangement of ‘The British Grenadiers’ on something like these lines:

an accompaniment made up of bouche fermée and la-la-la. We may be sure that the composer does not want the kind of la-la-la we get in a Weelkes ballet. Clearly he had in mind the soft thud of a drum. (The English version of the words is misleading in giving us 'tambourine' for 'tabourin.' Our old English 'tabor' would be as near as we can get. The French tambourin was a long narrow drum, played with one hand while the other managed a three-holed flageolet, a similar combination to the pipe and tabor which could be met with in England until recent years. It must be remembered that the words of the song are old French). All the voices are kept rather low, and the chorus parts contain some effects that certainly look well on paper. Here are a few bars of the first verse:

Ex. 2.

Quant j'ai ou - y le ta - bou - rin Son -

la . . . la la la la . . . la la la la la la la . . . la la la la

la la la la la la la

ner, • pour s'en al - ler au may,

la . . . la la la la la la la

la . . . la la la la la la la la la la la

Perhaps the Oriana Choir, who gave us one of the Chansons recently, will let us hear 'Quant j'ai ouy le tabourin.'

If some of these imitations are not sufficiently close to be convincing, we need not therefore assume that they fail to justify themselves. The oboe stop on the organ can never be mistaken for a real oboe—indeed it is like no orchestral instrument. Nevertheless, a good organ oboe is a very beautiful thing. There are other organ stops that, judged as imitations of the instruments after which they are named, are failures: judged on their merits, they are highly successful. Similarly, some of our choral-instrumental effects may fail to hit the bullseye, but they will score so well with some tonal by-product that our colour-scheme will be the richer. If you object that a voice should sound like a voice, and like nothing else, the answer is that we already recognise and enjoy so

Ex. 1. With a tow - row - row - row - row - row

Handwritten musical score for the song "The Rose Tree". The score is written on two staves. The top staff is in treble clef and the bottom staff is in bass clef. The key signature is one flat (B-flat). The time signature is 2/4. The melody is written on the top staff, and the bass line is written on the bottom staff. The piece ends with a double bar line and the text "&c." to the right.

A large body of male voices could give us not only a trill, but a thrill as well.

The soft thudding of the ordinary orchestral drum may be fairly well reproduced. Debussy has given us a lead here. The second of his 'Trois Chansons,' 'Quant j'ai ouy le tabourin,' is written for contralto solo, and chorus of contraltos, tenors, and basses. The chorus supplies many different kinds of vocal sounds that a few more won't matter. And I might further point out that the muted trumpet does not sound like a trumpet (except one of the penny variety), but nobody condemns it on that account. Of course, the effects we have been considering will be used only occasionally, and only one or two at a time. They will be employed chiefly to add to the significance of a song, though no doubt as they become generally accepted, choral compositions (without words) will be written in which many effects will be combined. We shall have brief symphonic poems for voices alone. Think how easily such works will illustrate pastoral scenes, effects of wind, waves, and various meteorological happenings so long as they are not too violent in character. The method will not supersede ordinary choralism: it will be merely supplementary—or complementary.

Perhaps the best way to disarm prejudice would be to treat the effects, not as imitations of instruments, but as new developments of vocal tone. I see no reason why we should not be prepared to accept for musical purposes any vocal sound that can be given a definite pitch—and perhaps a few that cannot.

All the signs point to more and more use of wordless vocal music, and this will in turn lead to the demand for a choral writing which will give us a texture made up of strands of contrasted colour. We shall have some of the women singing with nasal tone against the soft round notes of others, tenors divided into falsetto, chest, and head groups, variety obtained by sections of the choir using different vowel sounds at the same time, and so forth. If space permitted I could show that most of these effects have already been hinted at by composers of various periods. I believe the time has come for their serious consideration. Choral writing can develop little more in the way of complexity. It can never go much farther in the direction of multiplicity of parts, because of the limitations of compass. So long as real heavy basses are scarce we cannot build up a structure of vocal tone on orchestral lines, because the loftier the edifice the greater the need of foundation. Most attempts in this way have given us merely a tonal skyscraper very insecurely grounded. Clearly, then, developments will be chiefly along the line of colour variety, like those in most other departments of modern music. It is useless to object and call such devices trickery. Until recently bouche fermée effects were looked on as ad captandum. Now we realise that they are among the most subtly-beautiful of musical sounds. We have not yet realised all of them. For example, the Ukrainians gave us some unusually beautiful examples, one especially with an interplay of parts and a variety of nuance suggestive of a string quartet. And, by the bye, some of the Ukrainians' grouping and subdivision of the various parts made one wonder whether we have not been rather too consistently polyphonic in our choral-writing. Be that as it may, I believe that we shall soon see our choral writers making new demands on conductors and singers. These new demands, as I have implied, will not present much difficulty. They will be merely novel, and the chief trouble will be to get choirs to take them seriously. At first the singers will be self-conscious and giggle—perhaps be rebellious. Probably the Sheffield singers thought Coward was going too far, and asking them to make fools of themselves, when he called for the snarl and gibe in 'Gerontius.' They may feel much the same when he begins to work out some of the instrumental effects of the future. But they will end by doing them so convincingly that we shall wonder why we had to wait so long for them.

NEW LIGHT ON EARLY TUDOR COMPOSERS

BY W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD

VI.—RICHARD PYGOT

Although Richard Pygot does not loom very large as a church composer, yet as a trainer of composers and choir-trainer under Henry VIII. he deserves to be held in remembrance. For over thirty years he laboured in the cause of music, and as a favoured Court musician enjoyed unusual preferment. His name figures among the composers of the music printed in that unique work, 'Twenty Songs, IX of IIII parts and XI of III parts,' published by Wynkyn de Worde on October 10, 1520, containing compositions by Cornish, Ashwell, Couper, Fairfax, Jones, Sturton, Taverner, Gwynneth, and Pygot—of which the only known copy (Bassus) is in the British Museum.

Richard Pygot was born c. 1485, and at an early age entered the service of Cardinal Wolsey as a chorister. As early as 1517 we find him as Master of the Children of Wolsey's Chapel, an institution analogous to the Chapel Royal, the singers of which rivalled, if not surpassed, those of Henry VIII.'s own establishment. The following extract from a letter by Dean Pace to Wolsey, on March 25, 1518, gives an interesting notice of Pygot's success as a choir-trainer—all the more valuable testimony inasmuch as Dean Pace was an excellent amateur musician who had studied for many years at Rome:

The King hath plainly shewn unto Cornish [William Cornish, Master of the Boys of the Chapel Royal] that your Grace's Chapel is better than his, and proved the same by this reason that if any manner of new song [melody] should be brought into both the said Chapels [the King's Chapel and Wolsey's Chapel] to be sung ex improviso [at sight] then the said song should be better and more surely handled by your Chapel than by his Grace's.

Pace wrote a further letter on the following day to Wolsey:

The King has spoken to me again about the child of your Chapel. He is desirous to have it without the procuring of Cornish or other;

in other words, if Wolsey would not send the boy to the Chapel Royal, Cornish would adopt the expedient of impressment or conscription. As a result, on March 29, Pace informed Wolsey that the King thanked him for the child of his Chapel, 'whom he wouldn't have desired except from necessity,' and that he (Pace) 'had spoken to Cornish to treat the child honestly.'

In a fifth letter on the same subject, also from Pace to Wolsey, dated April 1, we note that Cornish was lavish in his praise of the boy of Wolsey's Chapel, 'not only for his sure and cleanly singing but also for his good and crafty discant.' Pace further informs the Cardinal that Cornish also praised Pygot for his excellent method of training: 'Cornish doth in like manner extol Mr. Pygot for the teaching of him.' It may be added that this discriminating musical amateur, who 'discovered' Pygot, was made Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in succession to Dean Colet, on October 25, 1519.

On January 20, 1520, the King paid a surprise visit, with nineteen gentlemen, to Wolsey's palace of Durham House, where he was royally entertained—Pygot directing the incidental music. Four years later, in 1524, Pygot was appointed a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, but retained his post in Wolsey's Chapel till the fall of the great Cardinal in 1529. It would seem that he was Deputy Master of the Children of the Chapel Royal in 1526, and we find a pension paid to him as such on May 1, 1527, 'the pension payable by the Abbot-elect of Whitby.'

Pygot retained the Royal favour after Wolsey's death, and on October 7, 1532, he was given a corrody in the monastery of Coggeshall, Essex, surrendered by William Colman. Further preferment awaited him, as on May 12, 1533, there is an entry in the Patent Rolls of his presentation to the canonry and prebend of Tamworth, vice Thomas Wescote, resigned.

Notwithstanding the suppression of the monastery of Coggeshall, an order was made on February 5, 1538, that 'Pygot of the Chapel' was to be paid his pension out of the confiscated property. Pygot also had a corrody out of the Abbey of Tower Hill, as by an order of March 23, 1538, Sir Thomas Seymour was bound to pay him a pension of £4 10s. His name appears in the Royal pensions list regularly during 1540-47.

Among the manuscripts in the British Museum (Add. MSS. 31922 f. 112b) is a charming carol by Pygot, for four voices, 'Musyng on her maners.'

On October 31, 1541, Richard Pygot was given a substantial sum for his house at Greenwich. But he must have continued to reside in the same locality, for on September 29, 1543, his name appears in the annuity list as 'of East Greenwich.'

Owing to some informality—very likely because he was a layman, and not even in minor orders—Pygot resigned his canonry and prebend of Wylmecot in Tamworth Collegiate Church of St. Edith; but on October 13, 1545, he was again presented to it by royal favour. In the following month a royal letter was written to the Dean and Chapter of Wells 'to suffer Richard Pygot of the Chapel to reside upon his prebend there, notwithstanding his laity.'

The last payment of £6 13s. 4d. a quarter by Henry VIII. to Richard Pygot was made on October 2, 1546, and in the account of liveries given out for the funeral of the English monarch on February 16, 1547, his name appears among the 'Gentlemen of the Chapel Royal.'

Pygot's services were retained by Edward VI., and he was in high favour at Court. On December 19, 1551, he was given the sum of xxxs. by the Princess Elizabeth, who also presented him with a douceur of xxis. on January 12, 1552. This is the last reference I have met with of the career of Richard Pygot, and he probably died in 1552.

'THE GREAT GOD PAN' AND ONE OF HIS CRITICS

BY H. ORSMOND ANDERTON

The vagaries of the genus Criticus Musicus form part of the Comédie humaine, and add to the gaiety of nations as well as, at times, to that of the victims, who are not all so shrinkingly sensitive as a Keats. An instance has recently occurred in relation to 'The Great God Pan.' Bantock incarnates himself as Pan, the god of wild nature—or calls him from the vasty deep—surrounded by troops of his fauns, satyrs, nymphs, dryads, and other embodiments of the forces of nature and earth. It is the same instinct that moved Debussy in his 'L'Après-midi d'un Faun,' and in giving a new and radiant 'body of music' to the old animism of early Hellas, Bantock has provided what will bring a tang of delight to many a heart hungering after this earlier naturalistic savour of existence. It is, in fact, a backward glance of regret and longing like that which a man sometimes casts over the days of his vanished youth.

Now it might be thought that one frankly using these old, yet ever young, symbols as the basis of his work might be assumed to disclaim any assumption of being the bearer of an absolutely novel gospel from some distant heaven of art—as hinting that he was not to be taken 'to the grand serious,' as Thackeray puts it. But no. The critic, without even waiting to hear the work, murmurs despairingly, 'No new thing under the sun,' and proceeds in that ironical vein which is the most treacherous weapon of criticism, having something of the nature of the boomerang. In a recent article in the Athenæum Mr. E. J. Dent complains that the dances remind him of the dances in 'Tannhäuser,' and that Pan and the nymphs remind him of Alberich and the Rhine-maidens. Well, dances do resemble dances, and ballets have something in common with previous ballets. How many stories are there in the world tricked out in various guises? They have been computed at some ten or a dozen. There is no absolutely new thing under the sun. The value of new work depends upon its added flavour, and how cunningly the disguises are carried out. I have talked with many good critics, all of whom have found the sauce piquante in this case amply sufficient. Mr. Dent is of course entitled to his own view, and to say that his palate can detect the goose through the condiments; but to complain that the goose is there is hardly the part of the camaraderie des bons vivants. In some cases even the most obvious 'cribbing' is accounted justified.

To take a well-known instance, which may hint also at the danger to the critic wielding the ironical boomerang. Suppose the learned scholar Ben Jonson, when they all adjourned to 'The Mermaid' after the production of 'Antony and Cleopatra,' had also assumed the rôle of Solomon the Wise, and sarcastically exclaimed—'Oh, Will, Will! Plagiariest! Pilferer!' 'Tis a thing of shreds and patches! Shade of Plutarch! That purple patch describing Cleopatra's appearance on the Nile is merely cribbed from his pages ['Antony'] and licked into "Marlowe's mighty line." Even supposing he had carried the impeachment by acclamation then, what should we think of him now? Do we not condone the larceny as justified, and make ourselves accessories after the fact? Or, to give another instance, has it not been the complaint of certain critics that the ethics of the Gospels themselves are not new? They are not; and yet they are not without a certain value in the world.

Again, Mr. Dent complains that the verse contains reminiscences of Shelley and Swinburne, and that Bantock 'makes the mistake of setting it as seriously as if it were really Shelley or Swinburne,' though in another place he wonders whether Bantock is really serious:

'He has treated the whole subject with such intense seriousness as to lead the reader to imagine that he has some deep symbolic meaning which he desires to express. If this is the case, he certainly deserves profound respect. . .'

Should we only, and always, set well-known men seriously? Did not Shelley and Swinburne themselves also 'plagiarise' from Greek myth? Might not our critic, e.g., complain that 'Atalanta in Calydon' is pseudo-classic, and that 'Prometheus Unbound' reminds him of Greek drama? And as for making the matter paramount, does Mr. Dent seriously think that Bantock really wishes us all to go back to this 'creed outworn,' and to revert, like Tarzan, to our ancestral jungle? The work is, as I have said, the regretful, lingering gaze, such as a man may sometimes cast over his lost youth or the youth of his race; and which even Wordsworth, stern moralist as he was, allowed himself—though we cannot without a smile think of the lanky bard of Grasmere ('like a camel,' said Lamb) seriously assuming the primeval 'costume' of Greek myth, and disporting himself with Proteus, Triton, and the Nereids, or toying with the tangles of Neëra's hair.

These general charges are not easy to refute, because, as we have seen, there is a sense in which they do represent a fact; they contain the proverbial half-truth. When we come to the definite points, however, the case is simpler. Mr. Dent says: 'Sometimes a bar of Stravinsky jostles a bar of Mendelssohn . . . but the bulk of the work is more or less in the idiom of Wagner and Tchaikovsky'; and 'The Russian Ballet has formed his last meal, and after a due interval, eructavit cor ejus a great matter, half ballet, half oratorio.' Now, as a matter of fact, 'Pan' was written before the Russian Ballet came to London (its production at the Sheffield Festival of November, 1914, was only cancelled by the war), and before Bantock had heard a bar of Stravinsky. There is a certain flavour of 'Alice through the looking-glass' in the suggestion that the 'copy' was made from a subsequent original. As for the assertion that the general idiom is that of Wagner and Tchaikovsky, the suggestion that the styles of these two are identical hardly disposes one to confide implicitly in the writer's sense of style; and most of those who have heard the work would deny that the idiom resembles that of either. I have not met with one who would agree. Bantock was undoubtedly impregnated with Wagner in his youth, as 'Cædmar' is sufficient to show. Just so, early Beethoven shows the influence of Mozart; early Shakespeare is often reminiscent of Marlowe; early Wagner reeks of Donizetti ('Die Feen'), and Meyerbeer ('Rienzi'); yet Beethoven, Wagner, and Shakespeare are allowed by most men to be real personalities. If it be rejoined that in this case it is not 'early' Bantock—well, even were the charge of plagiarism true, what about the Shakespeare-Plutarch case? Was Shakespeare not in his full maturity?

It would be interesting to find Mendelssohn in 'Pan.' Perhaps, for the sake of scientific criticism, Mr. Dent will point out the places.

As for the charge of 'Victorianism'—this is on a level with the enlightened gibes of some at the inhabitants of Suburbia. The calling a man 'suburban', or 'Early Victorian', simply reveals the mentality of the speaker. What matter the time and place of a man's birth? His work is the touchstone. Darwin, Ruskin, Browning, were early Victorians: are they the worse? Ruskin and Browning were suburbans: Keats, belonging to Finsbury and Hampstead, might be so called: is it a reproach? 'Half-ballet, half-oratorio' is another gibe—another whirl of the dangerous ironical boomerang. Might not the same charge be levelled at Bach's 'Matthew' Passion, which, as Schweitzer points out in his great work 'J. S. Bach,' is impregnated with opera? In Part I., Section VI., 'Histoire des Cantates et des Passions avant Bach,' he shows how these works were radically influenced and modified by opera; and on pp. 3, 4 we read: 'C'est Bach encore qui y met fin. Il réhabilite l'ancienne Passion en l'idéalisant; il écrit "La Passion selon St. Mathieu."' If Bach idealised opera in the 'Matthew' Passion, and was justified, why should another be condemned for impregnating oratorio with ballet—if he have really done so? But the whole charge is too solemnly ludicrous. The work is not an oratorio, nor a piece of didacticism. Bantock has no wish to convert us to the manners and morals and 'costume' of the poet's idyllic Arcadia. He casts a regretful backward glance upon his (and 'all of our,' as Punch says) vanished youth. Is the ironical sermon in place?

The wearied critic finds the whole stale, flat, and unprofitable, and languidly utters his soul in scathing sarcasm: 'Granville Bantock was once upon a time regarded as a revolutionary. He composed symphonic poems when respectable people confined themselves to symphonies. Years have passed, but, like Mr. Roebuck Ramsden (in Shaw's play 'Man and Superman'—quite scarifying this) he remains as advanced as ever he was. There is nothing new that he has not read, marked, and learned: it is only the inward process of digestion that he has begun to find a little less easy of accomplishment.' The weary King Ecclesiast, complaining that Bantock half-digests current writers—attempts, and fails, to assimilate them—reminds one of the disgusted traveller who comes upon a boa-constrictor with a half-digested bullock in its distended interior; but the loathly worm does, after all, digest its dinner. Does he feel, then, that there is no central personality beneath the various shiftings of form of our Proteus? He 'changes his skin' a good deal, it is true—Omar, Sappho, Fifi, a Pierrot, Dante, Pan—but most musicians can recognise a central core of identity. Would Solomon have preferred that he should have ceased to attempt to digest new ideas after he had given us 'Omar'? Should all his subsequent work have conformed to that idiom? It is not the way of really living writers. It is usually reckoned one of Wagner's merits that he resembles Shakespeare in this at least—that each work has its own style according to its subject. The style of 'Parsifal' is not that of 'Meistersinger,' or 'Tristan,' or 'Lohengrin.' Would it be better if it were? It would be absurd for Bantock to treat 'Pan' as he has treated 'Omar.' Mr. Dent would probably agree; and would only hold that other writers have been successful in preserving their identity through multifarious manifestations, whereas Bantock has failed. But every writer of this type has been reproved in the same 'faithful' accents.

Berlioz could make nothing of the 'Tristan' Prelude; Weber thought Beethoven ripe for a madhouse. Criticus Musicus should beware: the whirligig of time brings in his revenges, and these verdicts often serve only to pillory, not the criminal, but the judge, in the eyes of posterity. But still the Solomons persevere:

Though thrice a thousand years are past
Since David's son, the sad and splendid,
The weary King Ecclesiast
Upon his awful tables penned it,
Methinks the text is never stale—

the text of Vanitas vanitatum, i.e., as Michael Angelo Titmarsh moralises:

O Vanity of Vanities,
How wayward the decrees of Fate are,
How very weak the very wise,
How very small the very great are!

And if the last line be often true, Solomon should consider that perhaps the penultimate may sometimes prove to be so as well.

'Pan in Arcady' is no homely, but a Fantasy, and as such must be taken. It is the first half of a larger work—'The Great God Pan'—of which Part 2, 'The Festival of Pan,' is still incomplete. The Prelude opens with a six-fold invocational cry of 'Pan, god of the unfettered wild,' &c. It is for six-part double chorus (twelve parts), and, though extremely difficult, is very effective with its freely-used discords and complicated structure. It is sung by huntsmen, shepherds, country-folk, &c., as they lay offerings upon an altar before a statue of the god. The scene then opens and shows a woodland glade and pool amid the Arcadian mountains. After a Prelude depicting the forest, amid which Pan's piping is heard:

there follow the songs of the nymphs and dryads, on open vowels. The music then swells to a fuller lyrical utterance, and a breezy chorus ensues as a party of hunters cross the scene. Pan now enters, pursuing the nymphs, who, however, elude him and vanish. (This is the scene which, in Mr. Dent's view, too closely resembles that of Alberich and the Rhine-maidens.) Pan, left alone, has his first big song, a fine piece of bizarre characterization, with occasional glimpses of a finer side to his nature:

Ex. 2.

A mysterious section follows, symbolical of the travail of earth and of nature; and then, after a brief return of the nymphs and dryads, comes the episode of Pan's pursuit of Echo, which contains some lovely writing. She also, however, escapes him; and the stage is left empty. Shortly, to a delicate echoing motif (strings and celesta):

Ex. 3. Lentamente.

Pan re-enters piping, and again utters himself in song, showing this time the uprising of the better side of him. As he mourns the loss of Echo, voices of unseen nymphs and dryads are heard mocking him with the words 'Shadows! Dreams!' and Pan, regaining self-mastery, determines to ... seek the light divine

And attain the splendour,
Fold beauty to the soul,
Clasp the whole world's completeness.
Come, sing of joy!

This mood, however, passes for the time, and he summons his sub-human earth-creatures—fauns, satyrs, &c.—to revel with him. Here the more strictly ballet portion of the work begins, the part which needs stage-presentation most. We have (a) 'Revelry of Pan and Fauns'; (b) 'Dance of Pan and Satyrs'; (c) 'Revelry of Fauns and Satyrs'; (d) 'The wounded Faun'; and (e) 'Dance of Mænads.' This section is full of grotesque life, as these incarnations of earth-life and forest-life carry on their gambols. Very touching is the episode of 'The wounded Faun'; and it has some lovely music as the dying creature gazes upon the beauty of earth he is leaving for ever:

Lentamente sostenuto.

The music of the Mænads is a frenetic orgy of whole-tone scales and wild energy. It is very difficult, and the performance at Glasgow, despite scant rehearsal, was a marvel. Pan now sinks exhausted: the sun sets, and a shepherd crosses, calling his flock to fold with a simple, oft-repeated phrase. The moon then rises, and the moon-spirit appears:

EX. 5. Lentamente.

Cold and calm is the radiance of the music as she sings her first phrases, and the very impressive passage:

Pan's wooing of her follows, and leads to an impassioned uprush of music at their final union, with which the songs of the earth-creatures, the symbols of the forces of nature, mingle.

The orchestral colouring, as always with Bantock, is wonderfully sure and varied. The work is far from easy—the choral parts are evidently from the same mind as 'Atalanta,' though the style, on the whole, as befits the subject, is different from that of 'Omar' or any previous work. The performance at Glasgow was something of a triumph. Mr. Herbert Brown's Pan was well-conceived, embodying the rough energy—with more than a touch of the grotesque—of this god:

Two-horned, goat-footed, wild with shaggy hair, who has been degraded to the conventional devil of the Middle Ages.

The work as a whole, pace Mr. Dent, is an individual contribution to musical literature: there is nothing else of exactly the same type, and while to some it will not make quite the powerful appeal that 'Omar' does, it has a distinct character of its own, well maintained throughout, and by many minds will even be preferred. It is in any case an interesting and impressive piece of work, which is bound to take a permanent place in our musical literature. It is good to know that there is every probability of a performance of the purely ballet-portion (fifty pages in the vocal score) in London in the near future. We shall thus be able to form a closer acquaintance with the work, and to follow like sleuth-hounds upon the trail of the Mendelssohn reminiscences.

WESLEY, MRS. OOM, AND THE 'FORTY-EIGHT'

BY RICHARD CAPELL

Perhaps it is unwise to confess fondness for a copy of the original English edition of the 'Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues.' It is an eccentricity with which few musicians will sympathise. Of course in the newer editions the legibility is wonderfully improved, and the accuracy eagle-eyed. Few readers of the Musical Times, probably, would say 'thank you' for my old copy of the 'Forty-eight,' though Samuel Wesley himself has written his name on each of the four title-pages. The modern editions on shiny paper, with their fingering and phrasing and profuse marks of expression, are the editions for practical folk. Modern editors do not crowd two or three parts on one staff while the other is left empty; and proof-reading is taken more seriously now than a hundred years ago. As editor, Wesley is apt to let the music speak for itself, and you play it as the mood comes. There are no Italian directions for expression. Wesley was at the far pole from that German editor of Bach's violoncello sonatas who marks the slow movements amoroso. Wesley never, I believe, indicates amoroso, and hardly ever even forte or piano, legato or staccato. He leaves it all to you, and you may play your favourite fugue as you choose—tender and dreamy one day, dashing and truculent the next. Then beyond these omissions there are the misprints. Curious, is it not, in this autograph copy to find uncorrected an unflattened D in bar 6 of the E flat major Prelude (Book ii.)? In the F sharp minor Prelude, Wesley prefers to end on a tierce de Picardie; but the modern editors give us the minor chord. Not to be defended is his way in the D major Prelude—same book—of keeping the rhythm going in dactyls (12-8) throughout bar 2, instead of reining in with trochees (4-4). But the above-confessed fondness stands on no severe, practical ground. It is a matter of fancy.

No doubt this copy of Wesley's 'Forty-eight' is hardly worth a crown. Yet there is another sort of value, a fanciful value, in such old books and early editions. In the neighbouring mart of letters this fancy has its price. I try to imagine the equivalent in literature of my oblong folio. I suggest a 15th century 'Iliad' inscribed with the autograph of Erasmus. And it would not be in my possession, but gone across the Atlantic in exchange for its weight in gold. In that mart the most hard-headed people respect the sentiment attaching to early editions. What does that sentiment rest on? Surely on the fact that the production of a book, not less than its construction, breathes something of the spirit of its age. A flock of associations is evoked to the historical sense by the look of type and paper, helping the text with harmonious setting and companionship. Strong must be the book's content that can bear up against the mechanical uniform of present-day 'pocket classics' and the like; hardly the reader who can feed on the matter of a book without caring a jot for its manner. An unpractical man's fancy is not to be denied its play with the little historical suggestions of Wesley's folio.

It was published by Birchall, of New Bond Street, in four parts, between 1810 and 1813, costing subscribers 36s. and non-subscribers 48s. Of Wesley's assistant editor, C. F. Horn, Grove tells us all we need know—a German immigrant who attended on Queen Charlotte and the Princesses for music lessons. Both sign the Introduction, which yet must be Wesley's, for it is so English—majestically-rounded English of a disused mode.

'There are [he says] certain stupendous Works of Art which render Praise superfluous.' And among such instances he conceives 'the following Pieces of Harmony to be meritoriously enumerated.' He 'presents these matchless Productions in a more correct fashion than they have ever yet appeared, even in the Country where they were constructed,' and proceeds to recommend and explain 'the most eligible Method of studying and practising these immortal Exercises.'

The zeal peeping here through the Roman folds of language is surely very charming, and we feel endeared to the zealot, wondering at the disinterested pains he must have been at to collect his hundred and sixty subscribers. The question suggests itself, How hard or easy was it in 1810 to win enthusiasm for music admittedly 'abstruse' and containing, says, Wesley:

Pieces set in five or six Sharps, or as many Flats, Keys less in Use in England than on the Continent, and therefore at first puzzling.

The subscribers' names are printed, and one would like to know more about them, and more in particular about Mrs. Oom, who subscribed for twelve copies. In the lives of these subscribers—complacent subjects of George III.—the publication must have meant a deal. It is interesting to think of the hundred and sixty sedate ladies and gentlemen into whose experiences Wesley's zeal introduced this music, now a hundred years older and still just as much alive. To some of them these pages must have looked as strange as we find Schönberg and Malipiero. So at least one fancies, for 1810 means for most of us merely recollections of Jane Austen and 'Vanity Fair': but one cannot easily think of the 'Forty-eight' on the pianofortes of Miss Amelia Sedley or of Miss Emma Woodhouse. The old copy thus does more than just remind us of Wesley as the Bach pioneer, working here for Bach, as all the handbooks tell us, long before the romantic revival of Bach in Germany. It also enlarges for us the scene of 1810. Mrs. Oom, of 1810, who bought twelve copies of the first English edition of the 'Forty-eight,' is missed both by 'Vanity Fair' and Jane Austen. A pity; for her memory rests on a patch that is common ground to 1810 and 1920, our only patch of common ground, one might say. Our clothes have altered, our idiom is altering, our tastes in books and wines are different, our pictures, our politics, our locomotion—all are so different from 1810 that Jane Austen is read precisely because she is so deliciously unreal, because she is an escape into an impossible world like a Fête Galante of Watteau. And lo! a patch of common ground is revealed, whereon 1920 surprisingly discovers the reality of 1810. And thereon we—for whom age still cannot wither nor custom stale the variety of the 'Forty-eight'—respectfully salute Mrs. Oom of the twelve folios: whom we adore for her delight in these Immortal Exercises, which we share, while we are secretly consumed with curiosity to know why twelve? Almost certainly we never shall know, but it is pleasant to ponder the enthusiasm, the passion of this lady, who, all unsuspected by Miss Austen and her friends, was thus stretching forth a hand for the salute of the future.

Occasional Notes

We have received the report of the first year's activities of the League of Arts, and a striking record of successful work it is. Evidently the League has come to stay, for it announces various events for the coming summer. Among its plans are the production in London parks of several folk plays, and possibly 'A Midsummer Night's Dream.' The plays will be chosen from the following: 'The Fair Maid of Bristow,' 'Tom Tyler and his Wife,' 'The Taming of a Shrew' (the play on which Shakespeare founded his comedy), 'The Tragedy of Dido,' and 'A Looking Glass for London,' by Thomas Lodge. The League hopes to arrange some concerts in the parks, and promises also a performance of Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas.' Celebrations for May-Day and the feasts of the four patron saints of our Islands make up the balance of an ambitious programme. To what extent it will be carried out must depend on public support. The League asks for members, both performing and subscribing. The dramatic classes in connection with the scheme will be conducted by Mrs. Patrick Kirwan. Full particulars may be had from the hon. organising secretary, Capt. J. F. Thistleton, at the League's new Offices, 37, Russell Square, W.C.-1.

The Federated Board of the Music Industries of Great Britain and Ireland made a most auspicious start at the Connaught Rooms on January 30, when a company of over four hundred, including many distinguished musicians, launched the venture in the approved English fashion by eating together. At this distance of time we cannot deal with the matter as news, so we must content ourselves with wishing the organization every success. The need for some such co-operation was strikingly shown the week after the gathering, Messrs. Brinsmead's public announcement of their inability to produce pianos at a profit being followed by a joint statement of a group of manufacturers to the effect that they found no difficulty. We are glad to be able to add that as a result of a conference between the firm and the workmen, Messrs. Brinsmead have decided to revoke their decision to close down. It is to be hoped that manufacturers will in future be so well and truly federated as to make a repetition of such a contretemps impossible.

Several readers write pointing out that the author of the articles on 'Bach's Organ Works' has done a good deal less than justice to the young composer's pedestrian powers. Bach walked not fifty miles, but anything between two hundred and two hundred and fifty, to sit at the feet of Buxtehude. The mistake has been commonly made in England because our translation of Spitta gives the distance as fifty miles. It appears, however, that Spitta spoke of German miles, and a German mile is about four times as long as one of ours. The error has become firmly grounded since Parry repeated it in his book on Bach. Mr. Henry Davey draws attention to a more serious slip on the part of our contributor. It was not Bach who went to the wineshop during the sermon, but Rambach, the choir prefect, who was duly punished by four days' partial imprisonment.

Another correspondent inquires as to the authenticity of the fugue on the subject beginning :

He rightly considers that neither subject nor treatment suggests the work of a beginner, especially at so early a date as 1704. The fugue is omitted from the Widor-Schweitzer edition. Our correspondent says that he has met with it in a book of pianoforte music, where it was credited to another member of the Bach family. The editors of the Novello Edition state that Clementi, in Part 3 of his 'Practical Harmony,' attributes the Fugue to C. P. E. Bach. The subject is quoted in Marchant's 'Fugue Subjects and Answers' (No. 164) as being by the same composer. Perhaps some of our Bachites can throw further light on the matter.

The English Folk-Dance Society announces an Easter Vacation School of Folk-Song and Dance to be held at York from April 3 to April 10. Ordinary class instruction will be given in folk-singing, children's singing games, morris-, country-, and sword-dancing; and special courses will be organized for those who do not wish to study the Morris. There will also be daily demonstrations by the staff, and a Country Dance Ball. Full particulars are obtainable from the secretary, Miss Elsie W. Austin, 7, Sicilian House, Sicilian Avenue, Southampton Row, London, W.C.1.

Our note in last month's issue on the possible use of the gramophone as a substitute for church choirs called forth a paragraph in the Observer of February 8, from which it appears that considerable progress has been made in this department of mechanical music. We hope to take an early opportunity of hearing some records with a view to giving our readers further information.

Credit to whom credit is due! We note a tendency on the part of critics to speak of the opera season at the Surrey Theatre as if it were the first attempt to provide South Londoners with the standard operas at popular prices. Yet the 'Old Vic.' has been performing all the old favourites, from 'The Bohemian Girl' to 'Pagliacci,' for years past, and giving them in capital style to large and enthusiastic audiences. Only a few weeks ago 'The Marriage of Figaro' was well done, the production being in the hands of Messrs. E. J. Dent and Clive Carey. We hope the very deserving Surrey venture will be a great success. In fairness, however, to Miss Lilian Baylis and her hardworking staff at the 'Old Vic.,' we cannot refrain from pointing out that South Londoners are amongst the best educated opera-goers in London, save in respect of the more modern works.

BEETHOVEN, AFTER A HUNDRED YEARS

BY GEORGE GARDNER

(Archdeacon of Aston.)

When a lad goes away from home into the outside world for some years, he does not on returning necessarily despise his old surroundings. But they cannot seem to him quite the same. He probably has acquired a new sense of values. Therefore certain elements of nobility and antiquity show now with deeper impressiveness than they did to his childish eyes. On the other hand, he finds himself alive to imperfections and incongruities that in earlier days were unperceived.

A like change of perception should naturally come to us from time to time in the realm of musical art. Yet because that art specially expresses the mystical side of human thought, and also perhaps because it can be written only in a particular and an esoteric language of its own, it is unduly liable to become the object of fixed and uncritical veneration. Idols are set up for indiscriminate worship. There are idols, so to speak, of the market place—idols of the Choral Society and its clientèle found in Handel, and to some extent in Mendelssohn. Or, there are the idols of the cultured amateur, embodied in Beethoven and in Brahms. Something superhuman, a perfection that lies outside all caviil, is felt to exist in the godlike creatures who are thus revered.

None of us take up this attitude towards the great poets. With them we are only too ready to find marks of age, or downright tediousness, in some of their productions. But with music it is different. There, unstinted approbation seems to be expected. To take one instance—in the Oxford History of Music it is said of Beethoven's work: 'We may grant a few inequalities and a few mannerisms... yet these, even if judgment of them pass unchallenged, are but flecks in the sun.' (Here is indeed exalted praise, when one remembers how sun-spots are indistinguishable to the naked eye!). Or, again, the same volume (No. V.), when discussing the peculiarities of Beethoven's 'third period,' tells us, 'They are but enigmatic utterances of the Sphinx on the Pharsalian Plain, and we answer as Heine answered, "You cannot touch them: it is the finger of Beethoven".'

At this moment, just a hundred years have passed since Beethoven was writing the masterpieces of his later years, such as the Choral Symphony and the great Mass. Since then many things have happened in the world of music to put its denizens in the position of the boy who has had to leave his quiet home and to enter into the larger experiences of life. Most significant of all has been the emergence and the acceptance of Wagner. To some of us older ones it has indeed been a thrilling experience thus to watch the rising of a new star through mists of obloquy and opposition, till that star has swum into a settled and exalted place in the musical firmament. One should be careful not to claim overmuch for Wagner's artistic achievement. Admit that in it is to be found something of the crudities that we associate with the word 'melodrama,' or that in it are undeniable longueurs, yet we cannot but feel that here has been imparted to us a new sense of breadth and spaciousness in the treatment of musical forms. And size is an important element in art—at least if unity of building and continued interest can be secured, if the whole production is found to have in it the qualities of a living organism, of, say, a magnificent spreading tree. Think of how the masterly powers of Wagner's genius are shown in the way that his four immense works—'The Ring,' 'Tristan,' 'Meistersinger,' and 'Parsifal'—each maintain throughout their structure a unity of their own, obviously differentiated from the characteristics of the others. Wagner has shown, too, how a far deeper intensity of expression can be obtained through the power of music than had been known before his advent. In other ways, also, he has enlarged our outlook. So, too, men like Verdi (in his old age), Elgar, Franck, Strauss, Debussy, and some of the Russians, have helped to give us wider horizons. Many of the old landmarks are forgotten. The 'classical'—in the sense of what is, say, pre-Victorian—can no longer claim our unflinching allegiance, as it did in the time of our forefathers.

How do we stand, then, in regard to Beethoven—the composer who is commonly regarded as the last and the greatest of the classical school? It would be presumptuous to speak words of praise about some of his evident masterpieces—as impertinent as to set about belauding 'Lycidas.' What can be said adequately about the noble outline and the unfaltering vigour of the first movement of the 'Eroica' Symphony? Or about the cosmic dance at the end of the seventh? Or of the expression of stony grief along with virile hope at the beginning of the Choral Symphony—only comparable to what we see in the statues of the Medici Chapel at Florence?

All the same, it may be permitted to urge that the work of this grand master has often been unduly and indiscriminately praised. Wagner himself, writing in 1870, has declared that 'Beethoven's music will be understood at any time, whilst the music of his predecessors will, for the most part, remain intelligible only through the medium of light thrown upon it by the history of art.' Now, after another fifty years have gone by, we are in a position to see that this exalting of a great musician into a class by himself—a class from which Bach and Mozart are excluded—is not the result of sound judgment. No one, for instance, can nowadays have listened to a recital of several of the Pianoforte Sonatas without feeling that here and there they begin to 'date'—many parts of them undeniably have an air of speaking in the language of the past.

Confessedly it is a perilous task to find any fault with what have been for so long regarded as flawless objects of beauty. And judgment is inevitably complicated by the personal factor. It seems almost indecent to decry what one has learnt to admire, perhaps from boyhood. On the other hand, the very fact of close familiarity with a fine work may blind one to the charms which it might reveal were it approached with fresher perceptions. Still, after making all allowance for the existence of individual prejudice, it may be permissible to suggest that such movements as the following, taken almost at random, are open to the kind of criticism which has been indicated.

Look at the Andante con variazioni of Op. 26, as it unfolds its length, or the Andante of the Sonata quasi una Fantasia, or the Adagio in B flat of Op. 31. Here, and in other places, some of us are obliged to recognize a kind of sentiment and a way of expressing emotion that belongs to the past. No doubt a skilful pianist can still put plenty of feeling into such passages. But some listeners cannot help thinking that here is matter which made more appeal to a generation that admired Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King,' than it does to the changed palates of the 20th century. And when the Beethoven Sonatas are given in large doses, we are in danger of carrying over to places which unquestionably have suffered no deterioration an impression of something touched and aged by time. The air of the plains, as it were, clings to us even when we get on to the hills. Yet how mistaken it would be thus to approach the 'Appassionata' Sonata—that tremendous expression of heights and depths in human emotion, to which we might almost apply G. K. Chesterton's words and say that through it we 'list the trump of fate and hear a linnet sing.' Or, to cite further illustrations, remember the light-hearted cheerfulness of the last movement (Allegro assai), Op. 2, No. 3, and the noble gloom of the Largo e mesto (in D minor) of Op. 10, No. 3. Here are songs that age cannot wither or familiarity stale.

But to go back to the bad occupation of the advocatus diaboli: The 'Encyclopædia Britannica' describes the popular Andante in F, intended at first for the 'Waldstein' Sonata, as 'a spacious and gorgeous rondo.' Does it not now sound rather as if it belonged to the class of sentimental 'Lieder ohne Worte'? And does the modulation into D flat, made more sententious by repetition, still excite keen interest? Even as regards the slow movement of that great work the 'Hammerklavier' Sonata, some of us, if we are honest, have to confess that it has about it a quality that is decidedly soporific—though Dr. Eaglefield Hull asserts that it is 'one of the sublimest things in all music.'

The same authority tells us that the 'Pastoral' Symphony, though 'often slighted on account of its so-called realisms and its classification amongst "programme music," is nevertheless one of the finest pieces in the whole range of music.' And yet, once we free ourselves from the mental obsession that everything written by Beethoven is superb, we shall hardly fail to recognise that here is one of his weaker works, and that parts of it are not a little wearying, especially the Finale. This, however, is a bold thing to say, for Grove's Dictionary lays down that 'the man who listening to the "Sinfonia" Pastorale cannot see the beautiful landscape, sit down beside the brook, &c., &c., must be dead alike to every sense of poetry and art.'

Each detail of these works is held up to the same indiscriminate laudation. Here, e.g., is a bar that music we must of course set the indirect gain which results from the influence of such men over a generation of young musicians. Can we over-estimate the power and range of the personal influence of Parry during his twenty-four years as Director of the R.C.M.? Is it dearly bought at the cost of some unwritten works and some undoubted shortcomings in his published output? It is a difficult question, and the answer will vary with the point of view. What Parry's influence meant to thousands of young men and women can never be realised by those outside the College. They may, however, get some idea from a collection of his speeches to the students, just published under the title, 'College Addresses delivered to Pupils of the R.C.M. (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.). Speeches, addresses—both words fail to suggest the peculiar quality of these utterances. They are mostly of the homely and intimate kind that we call talks, or chats. And it is worth noting that they were not solely concerned with music. Many pages contain no reference to the art. As Mr. Colles says in his sympathetic preface, the purpose of the addresses

... was to build up the treasury of the mind, to suggest ideas for work and comradeship, to inculcate the true aim of education in its widest sense, and to point out the things which, in his own favourite phrase, "make a fine thing of life." With certain changes of illustration many of the addresses might have been delivered equally well at the Royal College of Science next door, or in the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford, or at a working-men's college. In almost every one of them there is some word which must be helpful to all concerned in whatever way with the education of themselves or of others.'

Quite in keeping is the frontispiece, which shows us a very unprofessorial Parry aboard the Wanderer, seated at the tiller, pipe in mouth. The publication of these twenty Addresses is an excellent idea. Why not a further set made up from the large number delivered elsewhere than at the R.C.M.? Parry's speeches at the R.C.O. during his three years as President deserve wider publicity than that given by the College Kalendar. There must be dozens of such wise, commonsense and human addresses buried in archives of various kinds.

Not often have we to complain of excessive modesty in these days, but here is a booklet minus not only the author's name, but that of the publisher as well. The price is one shilling, but apparently nobody wants the coin. Perhaps the printers, Messrs. Brook & Co., 8, Martin Lane, E.C.4, will answer inquiries. The booklet consists of 'Some Notes on how to sing Naturally,' and though it tells us nothing new—that would be too much to ask of any writer on the subject—it gives us some important truths in simple, commonsense language. Young singers should read it; even some teachers may find it worth while to meet with some suggestive ways of dealing with facts that are not too easy to make clear to the pupil. Perhaps the author will let us know where copies may be obtained, so that we may pass on the information.

Now, whereas a pamphlet really goes but a small way in such a matter as singing, it might well be sufficient for organ registration, because the subject is one about which it is difficult to lay down rules. There is no standard organ: stops called by the same name frequently differ in effect. Owing to the acoustical problems presented by many churches, it is impossible to hit on a scheme for a given piece that will not need modification—sometimes drastic change—in quite half the performances. Finally there is the question of taste. All that can be done is to lay down general principles, and leave the individual to apply them according to his local peculiarities. Mr. Everett E. Truette evidently thinks the subject can be dealt with like the kindred one of orchestration, and does so in 'Organ Registration,' a book of two hundred and fifty closely printed pages (Boston: Thompson & Co.; London: Winthrop Rogers, 12s. 6d.). The first twelve of his twenty-two chapters deal with the material of registration—stops, mechanical aids, combinations, borrowings, the acoustics of certain stops, and the influence of these acoustics on the tone of other stops, &c. It is all very thorough and interesting, and a careful perusal will widen organists' views of the subject, even if they do not always see eye to eye with the author. By the way, I am glad to see a word put in for the Tremulant, which is too often pooh-poohed as being merely a disturbance of the tone, whereas its effect when used with several stops of different pitch is to mix and blend the octaves in such a way that a new composite colour results. Even in the case of some single stops it makes the tone curiously vital and telling. Mr. Truette does not point out the importance of the beat being reasonably slow. Perhaps in America they have none of the rattling-peas-in-a-box type of tremulant from which so many organs in this country suffer. I do not feel disposed to part company with Mr. Truette until Part 2, wherein he proceeds to apply the principles he has laid down. He begins by giving us schemes for registering hymns and a batch of well-known anthems. But inasmuch as registration must depend upon the size of the choir—and even the balance or want of balance—as well as upon the character of the organ, its position in relation to the choir, the size and acoustical properties of the church, and the taste of the player, his suggestions are hardly likely to be practicable anywhere. His advice as to the giving out of hymn-tunes will not find favour on this side of the water—at all events I hope not. Such giving out is merely for the purpose of showing the tune about to be sung, and its pitch and pace. One line should be sufficient. Mr. Truette gives us the 'Old Hundredth' played all through, stops being added at the end of each line.

When a hymn follows some other music in a different key he will have us modulate. Such interludes are all very well when they are of some interest, though there is no need of them to-day when our ears are so accustomed to sudden changes of key. But even if we dislike being violently hurled into a new key, we shall dislike Mr. Truette's interludes even more. Thus, he suggests we should modulate from D flat to G in this manner:

We already suffer too much from such things. As the old lady in 'David Copperfield' said, 'Let us have no meandering.' The author also gives exhaustive registration for a large number of pieces, laying them out for organs of various sizes. Many of the solos are of such poor quality that it is waste of space treating them. Moreover, such schemes are of little practical use, for the reasons given above. On the whole, it is a pity Mr. Truette did not perceive that the excellent first part of the book tells us all we want to know. Like so many organists to-day he is inclined to over-register. We shall soon need a text-book setting forth the advantages of the use of uncoupled manuals and single stops, and the importance of not breaking the rhythm and flow of a piece by too frequent pulling-up for stop changes. Generally speaking, it is only the feeble kind of music that depends for its effect upon constant changes of stop. Recitalists should occasionally test their repertoire by playing it on the pedal-pianoforte. If they then discarded nearly all the pieces that had left their interest and effect in the organ loft, it would be a good thing for the status of the instrument and its music. And what a jolly bonfire we could make with the throw-outs!

THE IDEAS OF M. VINCENT D'INDY

By C. SAINT-SAËNS, DE L'INSTITUT

(Authorised translation by Fred Rothwell)

I.

By reason of his talent and erudition, by virtue of his position as the founder of a school, M. Vincent D'Indy has acquired great authority. Everything he writes must of necessity possess considerable influence.

Under the sway of such considerations, it has occurred to me that it might be useful to point out—even though it be to my detriment—certain of his ideas in the 'Course of Musical Composition' which do not agree with my own. Not that I claim to be a more or less infallible oracle; it does not follow, because M. D'Indy's ideas are not always mine, that they are therefore erroneous. I will state my arguments: the reader shall judge for himself.

On opening M. D'Indy's book one is immediately struck with admiration at the loftiness of his conceptions. We see how careful the author is—an attitude which cannot be too greatly admired—to look upon Art as one of the most serious things in the world. He ascends higher and ever higher until we suffer from vertigo as we follow him, and find that he places art on a level with religious faith, demanding from the artist the three theological virtues—faith, hope, and charity—and not only faith in art, but faith in God! We may remark that Perugini and Berlioz, who were lacking in this faith, were none the less admirable artists, even in the religious style, but we need not labour the point.

Religions, in themselves admirable objects of art, are incomparable springs of artistic expression. Deduct from architecture, sculpture, painting, even music itself, everything that deals with religion, and see what is left!

All those Jupiters and Junos, Minervas, Venuses and Dianas, Apollos and Mercuries, Satyrs and Nymphs, those mythological scenes painted on the walls of Pompeii—all that art, which we regard as profane, is religious art. It is the same in Egypt and India, in China and Japan, and even among savage tribes.

Such considerations make it easy to imagine that art has its source in religion. All the same, its origin is an even more modest one. Art came into being on the day that man, instead of being solely concerned with the utility of an object he had made, concerned himself with its form, and made up his mind that this form should satisfy a need peculiar to human nature, a mysterious need to which the name of 'aesthetic sense' has been given.

Afterwards form was enriched by ornament, or decoration, which serves no other purpose than to satisfy this aesthetic sense. Subsequently it became man's desire to reproduce the form of his fellow beings, human and animal, and he began to do this—as a child still does—by a stroke or line. This line does not exist in Nature.

Here is the starting point in the radical difference between nature and art; art is destined not to reproduce nature literally, but to suggest an idea of nature. This principle, badly interpreted, gives rise to the aberrations which manifest themselves at the Salon d'Automne and the Salon des Indépendants.

It is by virtue of this principle that the most insignificant sketch affords a sensation of art which will never be supplied by the finest photograph, however 'artistic.'

It is also on this account that the purists are mistaken when they attack 'imitative music.' Real imitative music would consist of the green-room noises by which a life-like imitation is given in the theatre to the wind and the rain and the various other sounds of nature. So-called imitative music does not imitate, it suggests. Composers have described storms, but there is not one that is like any of the rest. The singing of birds, which offends certain persons in Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, is there imitated in very imperfect fashion; it is this very fact that constitutes its charm.

Nevertheless, it is from the sounds of nature, the sounds produced by the wind blowing through the reeds, and more particularly from the utterance of the human voice, that music had its birth.

When art was born, religion took possession of it. Religion did not create art.

M. D'Indy, like Tolstoi and M. Barrès and many other thinkers, seems to see nothing in art but expression and passion. I cannot share this opinion. To me art is form above all else.

It is perfectly clear that art in general, especially music, lends itself wonderfully well to expression, and that is all the amateur expects. It is quite different with the artist however. The artist who does not feel thoroughly satisfied with elegant lines, harmonious colours, or a fine series of chords, does not understand art.

When beautiful forms accompany powerful expression, we are filled with admiration, and rightly so. In such a case, what is it that happens? Our cravings after art and emotion are alike satisfied. All the same, we cannot therefore say that we have reached the summit of art, for art is capable of existing apart from the slightest trace of emotion or of passion.

This is proved—speaking only of music—by the fact that during the whole of the 16th century there were produced admirable works entirely devoid of emotion.* Their true purpose is thwarted when an attempt is made

* There are a few exceptions, notably in Palestrina's 'Stabat Mater.'

The

Competition Festival Record

No. 140.

AN ADJUDICATOR'S WANTS.

As an adjudicator of many years' experience I have acquired a great respect for the folk who organize competitions. They have an enormous amount of preparatory work to carry out, and as the day of competition approaches the clerical and organizing duties of the staff are many, various, and difficult. Amid the turmoil it may occur to the harassed secretary to wonder whether he has provided, as fully as he should, for the comfort and convenience of that exacting and often very fidgety person—the adjudicator. In case there are some—my experience, too, suggests that there are—who might be at a loss as to the best means of satisfying him, I am bringing forward a few points that are apt to be overlooked here and there, and with them a few personal likes and dislikes that may perhaps be less urgently felt by another adjudicator (a horrible word to write, henceforth I shall call him judge):

- (1.) The test-pieces to be sent to the judge a week or more before the competitions. If it is only through the first competitor that he makes acquaintance with a piece, his standard is apt to vary as acquaintance ripens and the possibilities of the piece dawn upon him.
- (2.) The judge's table should be well isolated and not in a draught (he is a prisoner—others can come and go), and one likes to pass from table to platform and back without climbing or jostling.
- (3.) Writing paper. This should be plentiful and of good quality. In the case of important choral competitions a judge may need a separate sheet for each choir in each piece. If a marking system is printed and sectioned out on the paper it should be one to which the judge has previously agreed.
- (4.) Pencils (plural), and a knife to sharpen them with when the points break. What matter if it depart with the judge? Aren't we all on the scrounge?
- (5.) A clamorous bell, in good working order.
- (6.) The judge should have certain arbitrary powers during a competition. He should be allowed to stop a performance that is obviously a waste of time; to decree, before a competition starts, that all competitors shall begin at a certain point in the music or stop at a certain point; to recall solo candidates at the end (this would be hardly fair in the case of choirs and orchestras); to require the services of the official accompanist when he is satisfied that a private accompanist is doing the candidate harm. The important point is that these provisions should be made quite clear to all concerned (say by a note in the syllabus) before the competition. These powers are not usually grudged, but it is awkward to have to claim them on the spot.
- (7.) It should similarly be made clear to all that silence must prevail during all performances, from the moment when the judge rings his bell for the start. A strict watch should be kept on the doors.

- (8.) A clear indication, to the eye, of the candidate's number is an obvious necessity that is often overlooked.
- (9.) It is sometimes arranged for a chord to be struck immediately after the conclusion of an unaccompanied piece in order to register pitch-variations in an unmistakable manner. Not that the judge usually needs any telling, but this method makes it impossible for him to forget about pitch. (There is a disadvantage in that the practice is apt to make audiences attach too much importance to the maintenance of pitch, and often to prejudge a competition chiefly on this score.) The important point is that if it is done for one choir it must be done for all, and the official accompanist must be there to do it.
- (10.) From the end of one performance till the bell is rung for the next the judge's mind is working at high pressure. He is still sizing up what he has just heard and casting about for terms in which to describe his opinion of it from the platform. Some quite nice people think this an opportune moment to come up to him and chat about the weather or strikes, and—'Do you happen to know my cousin?' He is organist at St. Swithin's'—and so on.
- (11.) It is not always possible to deliver a judgment immediately the competition has finished. The judge may want a few minutes in which to collect his thoughts, arrange his papers, perhaps to check his arithmetic. It helps him greatly if some small item of the day's proceedings can be arranged to intervene here. This is a good time for announcements, for the audience is keen and expectant.
12. A judge is not a machine. He is something better—a human being, with a nervous as well as an alimentary system. Both need proper sustenance, and nature's provender for brain and nerves is repose. After the strain of several hours of minute and intense mental application, all of a 'now or never' urgency, a short interval and a hastily swallowed meal are a poor preparation for more work of a similar character. Give the judge time to take his meal at leisure and in quiet. Here I am going to put forward a thoroughly churlish plea. It is a great relief for a modest individual like myself (and most of my fellow judges) to recede from the limelight for a while and retire into an obscure corner in humble loneliness. I have often longed during my refreshment interval to sit quietly apart and read cricket scores or my latest Arnold Bennett, or to saunter unknown in the neighbouring recreation-ground with only my pipe for company. The social life of these festivals is usually very charming, but there are moments when an overworked man can only enter into it with an effort that adds to the strain of his duties instead of relieving it. This may seem ungracious, but it comes from the heart.

My list of hints seems to have degenerated into a grumble. Perhaps (1) is the point least understood by inexperience secretaries and judges; (6) helps towards smooth working. Dr. McNaught was usually firm on this point; (12) never seemed to trouble him.

No doubt other ideas will come to mind as soon as this article is in print, but the Editor is impatient, so I will retire; and, lest there be any I have offended, remain unrecognised as SENEX.

THE BLACKPOOL FESTIVAL.

The revival of this Festival has been fixed for October 18-23 next. All the classes outlined in the syllabus of the competitions of 1914 (which were abandoned) are retained in this year's scheme, with the addition of a class for the numerous small Sunday Schools scattered about the Fylde. It was felt that it would be impossible to re-adopt all the music selected for 1914 in the big open classes on the final day. Some of the older choirs still have to rediscover themselves, and some will be new-made, wholly or in part. Moreover, some of the 1914 music is no longer accessible, except perhaps in a limited quantity. Hence the adoption of a musical scheme which has, to a small extent, retained features of the 1914 syllabus, and for the rest has fallen back on some of the finest music of recent years. The following are the tests in the principal classes:

FULL ORCHESTRAS.

'Froissart' Overture* (Elgar).

STRING ORCHESTRAS.

Suite, 'Sally in our alley' and 'Cherry ripe' (Frank Bridge).

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

'Ave Maria' (8-part) (Gustav Holst).

'Sound sleep' (Vaughan Williams).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Tenor lead):

'The old soldier's dream' (Cornelius).

'The lost leader' (Bantock).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Alto lead).

'Harmony'* (Beale).

'The mad dog'* (Parry).

SMALL MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

'Cynthia, thy song' (Croce).

'The shower' (Elgar).

CHALLENGE SHIELD CLASS (for Mixed-Voice Choirs).

'As Vesta was from Latmos Hill descending' (Weelkes).

'The Tempest'* (Elgar).

'The surrender of the soul' (Cornelius).

The vocal solo classes have involved still more reconstruction. We hope to give details next month.

THE MORECAMBE FESTIVAL.

After five years of enforced idleness this Festival again resumes its work, opening on May 6 with a syllabus that shows a determination to maintain the level of past achievements. On the resignation of Mr. John Hatch, to whose wisdom and foresight the Festival owes much of its success and artistic development, Mr. Fuller-Maitland has succeeded to the post of president. Captain W. de Ceury Smalé is musical director to the Festival, and Mr. William C. Fawcett secretary.

Below we give a selection of the chief choral test-pieces:

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

'Queen of heaven' (six-part) (Brahms).

'Forest fay' (Schumann).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

'It keeps eternal whisperings' (Hathaway).

Rhapsodie (Brahms).

'Arm thee' (Walford Davies).

'United are we' (Brahms).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

'The witches' Sabbath' (Leslie Heward).

'Happy streams' (Rootham).

'Light of my soul' (Pearsall).

SCHOOL CHOIRS.

'Away, thou shalt not love me' (three-part unaccompanied) (Wilbye).

Cantata, 'The dragon of Wantley' (Arkwright).

The adjudicators are Mr. S. H. Nicholson, Dr. Bairstow, Mr. Geoffrey Shaw, Mr. Fuller-Maitland, and Mr. Bennett North. Two concerts are arranged, at which Miss Muriel Foster has promised to sing.

THE EDINBURGH FESTIVAL.

We are glad to learn that a new Festival has been inaugurated at Edinburgh. It is long overdue. For some years past Glasgow, Aberdeen, and other Scotch cities and towns have done their share in fostering the competition movement, and the backwardness of the capital left a gap that needed filling. The organization known as the Edinburgh Musical (Competition) Festival Association has been formed for this purpose, under the presidency of the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, and with Mr. David Latto, 27, George Street, as hon. secretary. The Festival is to take place on May 20, 21, and 22, entries closing on March 20.

The list of competitions provides for school choirs, children's action-songs, junior choirs, female-voice choirs, male-voice choirs, mixed-voice choirs, church choirs, vocal quartets and duets of various classifications, vocal solos (with special classes for Scots folk-song), brass quartets, string quartets, and other forms of chamber music, and instrumental solos. The following are the tests in the open choral classes:

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

'My love dwelt in a northern land' (Elgar).

'All creatures now are merry-minded' (Benet).

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

'Night' (Hamish MacCunn).

'The Tambourine Player' (Schumann).
(Both unaccompanied.)

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

'After many a dusty mile' (Elgar).

'Scots wha ha'e' (arranged for four parts by H. S. Robertson).

CHURCH CHOIRS.

'O send Thy light forth' (Balakireff).

'Call to remembrance' (Farrant).

JUNIOR CHOIRS (age under seventeen).

'The Nightingale' (Weelkes).

'Music, when soft voices die' (Charles Wood).

SCHOOL CHOIRS.

'There is a garden in her face' (John Ireland).

'A croon' (Herbert Howells).

The adjudicators are Mr. H. Plunket Greene, Dr. Vaughan Williams, and Mr. Hugh S. Robertson.

to render them expressive. Wherein does the Kyrie of the famous Missa Papæ Marcelli express supplication? Here there is absolutely nothing else than form. On the other hand, see to what a low level music descends when it disdains form and sets emotion in the forefront!

It may here be worth while informing amateurs that music is not—as Victor Hugo has well said in giving form to the most widespread of all feelings—the vapeur de l'art; it is a plastic art, one that is made up of forms. True, these forms exist only in the imagination, and yet, does art as a whole exist in any other way? These forms are but imperfectly reproduced in musical writing, though sufficiently to suggest them. On this account music should not be written with figures which represent nothing to the eye. It is also for this reason that those who do not read music have some difficulty in forming an idea of it, unless they happen to be gifted with a special aptitude for this art. To them it is indeed the vapeur de l'art, a source of sensations and nothing else, and so we find that they take pleasure in listening to the most divergent works, the finest and the most despicable alike; they see no difference in them.

London Concerts

BY ALFRED KALISCH

Concerts have been very numerous, but have not been conspicuous for the amount of novelty they have introduced. Still the month's harvest of new things is not inconsiderable.

It is not always the largest works that are the most important. Thus Mr. Julius Harrison's 'Worcestershire Pieces' (an orchestral version of a suite of pianoforte pieces), produced at a Queen's Hall Symphony concert on January 24, are slight, but charming. One of them, entitled 'Pershe Plums'—a serene little idyll—attracted a good deal of attention on non-musical grounds. The last, 'The Ledbury Parson,' is a brisk open-air treatment of a conspicuously jolly folk-song. At the same concert Mr. Lamond's playing of Brahms's second Concerto was quite masterly, but one could not resist the feeling that this work was beginning to date. Some new pieces by the revolutionary American, Leo Ornstein, which were announced, could not be played because the parts had not arrived in England. The Queen's Hall Symphony Concert on February 7 was notable for the fact that for the first time for many a month the 'House full' notices were displayed. This was no doubt largely due to the names of the soloists (Madame Suggia, who played Schumann's 'Cello Concerto superbly, and Mr. Gervase Elwes), and the presence of Dr. Ethel Smyth, who conducted 'On the cliffs of Cornwall' (from 'The Wreckers'). The Symphony was Brahms's No. 1. The other orchestral numbers were 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' and the Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan and Isolde.' This may be put on record as a guide to programme makers.

Mr. Anderson Tyrer continues to improve his position. At his last concert, on January 27, Mr. Hamilton Harty introduced Granville Bantock's 'Overture to a Greek Tragedy,' the tragedy being Sophocles's 'Edipus Coloneus' (unfortunately misspelt 'Colonnos,' and so reproduced by many writers). It is nine years old. When a work by a man of Mr. Bantock's position takes nine years to reach London the cynic will usually find the reason is the piece itself. It was to be found there in this case. It is solid and dignified, but is hardly the real Bantock.

At the Albert Hall Sunday Concerts the policy of introducing us to conductors not well known in London is being pursued with good results. Thus we heard Mr. Ainslie Murray, of Edinburgh, who justified his choice, and Mr. Godfrey came from Bournemouth—but he hardly needs introduction.

Mr. Frank Bridge is rapidly assuming an almost official position of the conductor who is sent for in an emergency. A few weeks ago he replaced Sir Henry Wood at a few hours' notice. On February 10 he took the place of Mr. Raymond Rôze, who was unfortunately too ill to conduct the concert of the British Symphony Orchestra. The novelty of the concert was Mr. Rôze's effective 'Poem of Victory,' for violin, with the solo part beautifully played by Mr. Sammons, and Mr. Holbrooke conducted his own early work, 'The Viking.' It is one of his most lucid and picturesque scores, though possibly not the most original. Mr. Holbrooke is not easily pleased, but he can have no reason to complain either of its performance or its reception by the audience.

At the London Symphony Orchestra concert on February 16 Sir Thomas Beecham conducted a programme in which Leonardo Leo, Mozart, and Handel represented the 18th century—of which he is specially fond—Wagner and Brahms the 19th century, and Delius the 20th. All the works were well known, except the little Symphony of Leo. It has a middle movement with a heartfelt little melody (charmingly played by Mr. W. H. Reed), but for the rest it is only of educational interest. This, however, is considerable. It would be greater still if we knew exactly how much the arranger had done to the work. Mr. Sammons's playing of the Brahms Concerto won the admiration of all except those who look upon the introduction of anything like charm or beauty into the music of Brahms as a pollution of the well of music undefiled. It is hard to believe that Brahms himself would go so far in this matter as some of his less judicious idolaters.

In his interpretation of Brahms's fourth Symphony at the Philharmonic Concert on January 29, Mr. Adrian C. Boult struck a happy mean and pleased everybody. He has never done anything better. Mr. Sammons played Delius's Concerto. It does not improve on acquaintance. The lack of anything like a broad melodic phrase for the soloist makes itself almost painfully felt. The constant figuration for the violin ends by sounding almost fussy. The atmospheric beauty of the music is, however, undeniable, and the last pages appeal to the heart. One wonders whether Delius had heard the ending of 'Don Quixote' before he wrote it.

The pianistic giants have not appeared in London lately (except for the playing of the Brahms Concerto by Mr. Lamond, mentioned above), but there has been some unusually good pianoforte-playing by younger artists. The two Scriabin recitals by Miss Lilius Mackinnon and Miss Eurydice Draconi were interesting. The latter struck me as having more charm, the former a completer grasp, but each was good in both respects. Mr. York Bowen played some Brahms thoughtfully, and the Variations of Rosenbloom, the Berceuse of Clutsam, and the 'Merry Andrew' of John Ireland, which he introduced, show that English composers can write good pianoforte music which is not esoteric or abstruse. Miss Jessie Bristol, who gave a Schumann recital on February 4, is a home-trained artist of personality and unusual promise, and Miss Margaret Tilly deserves encouragement.

There have been many singers, too. Mr. Mark Raphael promises to develop into an extremely intellectual interpreter, but he should be warned of the danger of underrating the value of technique pure and simple. When he has struck the right balance he will go far, for he is gifted with an excellent voice.

The earnest art of Mr. Hugh Marleyn deserves every recognition, and Miss Gertrude Blomfield at her concert gave evidence of development both in technique and interpretative power which was a welcome surprise. Mr. Alban Grand promises to be a more than useful recruit from the operatic stage to the concert platform, when his lapses into the operatic manner are less frequent. Mr. John Booth's singing of English songs was in all ways pleasing and able.

It had been thought that Schubert's Octet was one of the things that the musical world had made up its mind to forget, but the way in which it was welcomed at the concert of the London Chamber Concert Society dispelled the idea. At the same concert the British String Quartet, led by Miss Marjorie Hayward, played the Debussy Quartet with notably good ensemble and charm of tone. At the second of these concerts Miss Jelly and Miss Adila d'Aranyi's performance of Bach's Double Concerto was quite out of the common. Special interest attached to the return, after a long absence, of Miss Isolde Menges (February 7). She has developed into an artist of high rank, as she promised to do. Except for some curious speeding up in unexpected places, her playing of a Handel Sonata was admirable. There will be other opportunities for discussing her more fully.

The compositions of Mr. Boris Levenson, who gave a concert on January 21, should appeal to a large public. He is a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov, and writes with unusual ease and fluency. He does not cultivate the modern Russian idiom, but his music betrays the land of its origin. A Serenade for violin, played by M. Michael Doré, is effective and taking, and his songs are pleasing and tuneful without being commonplace.

A distinctive feature of this period of our musical life in London is the number of ballad concerts. There are no fewer than four sets in full swing. I cannot often go, because on Saturday afternoons there are usually other things with prior claims. I did, however, go to one at Queen's Hall on January 31, and convinced myself that reports of the raising of the standard there are not exaggerated. The two new songs I heard—Mr. Coningsby Clarke's 'Venetian lullaby' and Mr. Frank Bridge's 'When you are old' (admirably sung by Miss Carmen Hill and Mr. Gervase Elwes respectively)—would not have been out of place at the severest concert of British music. It is true the people applaud a little automatically and indiscriminately, but audiences which will encore such songs do not deserve all the barbed arrows of scorn we are apt to direct at them. The whole programme was such that a ballad concert audience of ten years ago would have fled from in undisguised alarm as being 'too classical.' So much the better. In this connection it is worth while referring to the report that next season the London Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Hamilton Harty, is to be a permanent feature of the Albert Hall Ballad Concerts. As they generally take place on the same afternoons as the Queen's Hall Symphony Concerts, the result will be interesting.

Opera in London

BY FRANCIS E. BARRETT

PERFORMANCES FOR THE PEOPLE

The chief event of the month in the operatic world has been the opening of the Fairbairn-Miln undertaking at the Surrey Theatre. This is designed to provide opera for the people. The plan is to be commended, for it has always been a charge against this art-form that it was for the well-to-do only. Why it should not be as well known to all classes is a question I have never been able to answer. I can see no reason why folk of modest means should not have opera as well as those more richly endowed. It is an elevating form of amusement that combines several arts in one; and where the form is represented in a proper manner—i.e., when the work is a thing of life and movement, of spectacle and action, and not merely a glorified duet—it provides as good an entertainment as one could wish the public to have.

Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton Miln are co-operating with Mr. Thomas Fairbairn, an operatic manager of experience and enthusiasm, and the result has been eminently satisfactory for a beginning. Of course there are all sorts of difficulties in the way of an undertaking of this kind, and perhaps the greatest difficulty of all is that of the supply of performers. It is not possible for a manager to turn to the schools of music and say, 'Here is a chance to gain experience for the pupils you have been training for opera,' for the extremely simple reason that the schools have no such pupils, or if, as in one solitary case, there has been an attempt to give teaching in operatic work, it has not been long enough in force to produce tangible results. As a consequence the manager has to trust to providence and his own judgment, to say nothing of his ability to drill his forces.

Plenty of good material has been seen at the Surrey Theatre. Very wisely the undertaking went to work quietly and modestly with the one object of putting before a public that had probably never seen it, an illustration of the form which should be comprehensible. Good sense was shown in making a beginning with typical examples of opera. For the first fortnight the bill was filled with 'Faust,' 'Rigoletto,' 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' 'Pagliacci,' and 'Trovatore.' These attracted the public to whom the names were familiar, and who possibly found that they knew some of the airs. At all events they showed the utmost readiness to listen to the operas, and moreover expressed their complete pleasure in the representations. These have been of the sound, good-all-round order, with tuneful singing, clear pronunciation of the words, and a wholly adequate representation of the orchestral score by a competent band.

As the result of having attracted the public and not frightened it away by putting on what it did not understand, the people were quite ready to take part in what must have been to many an experiment when the 'Flying Dutchman' was mounted. There was a very large audience for Wagner's early nautical opera, and one that showed the keenest appreciation of its points. Whether all were clear in their minds about the story and its import is a question I cannot answer. What struck me, and, I must admit, impressed me very forcibly, was the eagerness on the part of the audience to convey its appreciation. The whole thing supports the contention that if opera were put before the public at prices within its means, the public would take to it. I cannot see, and shall never be able to see why Londoners should not have opera as close to their doors as the music-hall.

It is clear from the 'Flying Dutchman' being put on that no conventional spirit prevails at the Surrey Theatre, and I find confirmation in the fact that some British operas are to be added, all of them the work of living composers. Examples by Mr. Colin McAlpin, Mr. Nicholas Gatty, and Mr. J. E. Barkworth are promised. There is some prospect therefore that the Surrey patrons will be better informed on British opera than those on the other side of the Thames.

As to the performances themselves, these have revealed some excellent material. Some of the company are new-comers, and obviously treading the stage for the first time; others are experienced hands whose efforts have helped to secure balance. Excellent voices are possessed by Miss Ida Cooper (Marguerite), Miss Maryan Elmar (Senta), Miss Ethel Peake (Santuzza), Miss Mabel Corran, and Messrs. Frank Webster, Lissant Beardmore, Leslie Austin, Philip Vallentine, Augustus Milner, and Harry Reynolds, who have already been heard in London. Both chorus and orchestra are small but notably good.

GROWTH OF LIGHT OPERA

There seems to be both a desire for and an endeavour to improve the quality of the music of 'musical' pieces, and though some of the products are labelled 'light opera' rather freely, it is not difficult to realise the intention to improve the quality of musical comedy until it shall actually become light opera. The best matter so far comes from France and from M. Cu villier, two of whose pieces have been done. One was 'Wild Geese' (Comedy, February 12), and the other 'Sunshine of the World' (Empire, February 18). As yet the British composer has to win his spurs in these lists. The present difficulty is the lack of initiative on the part of managers in exploring fresh fields and producing pieces that are both musicianly and literary.

OPERA IN ENGLISH AT COVENT GARDEN

At the end of the month—on February 24—the Beecham Company was announced to make its reappearance at Covent Garden for a further season of six weeks' duration. A widened repertoire has been arranged, to include the 'Mastersingers,' Mr. Delius's 'A Village Romeo and Juliet' is to be revived, and several favourite works not seen during the autumn are to be given. The first work down for performance was 'Parsifal,' which the London public, at least, seems always ready to hear, whatever may be the attitude of the provincial audiences towards it.

A special symphony concert given at the Pump Room, Bath, on February 12, brought to notice a work by Signor Clerici, entitled 'Armida,' which the composer conducted.

Choral Notes and News

BY W. McNAUGHT

THE CONTINENTAL WAY

London is not accustomed to sensations in choral music, and the London public therefore was not moved to excitement by the announcement—made in January—that a choir from the Ukraine was going to sing at Queen's Hall. Even after the choir had made several appearances it was not realised, apparently, that we had in our midst something comparable, say, to the first Sousa band or the Southern Syncopated Orchestra, so feebly do the words 'choir-singing' resound in London ears. Yet those who did happen to be at Queen's Hall when the Ukrainians were singing found that they had hit upon a new thrill. If these singers had made a long season in London* and had given concerts daily they might have become the wonder of the day. It would perhaps have dawned on people generally that there were greater possibilities in choral singing than they had been taught by their own practitioners, and they might have asked why it was necessary to wait for a choir from Eastern Europe to demonstrate them. In the end there might have been a quickening of the choral life in London and a vitalising of thought and habit. Perhaps even the short lesson from the Ukraine will stimulate at least a few individual efforts at imitation.

It is not suggested that the singing of these visitors represented the highest musical standard and the most desirable form of choral interpretation; but it had far more character, reality, and cleverness than anything in London traditions, and it is useful for all and sundry to see how far such qualities can be developed. There are some who are privileged to know from evidence within our shores that this vitality and skill can be put to the service of great music and a moving and thoroughly artistic style of interpretation.

On all occasions when an opportunity is given to form an estimate of Continental choral singing, one is faced with a set of ideals different from those which inspire the best English singing, and to our ears belonging to a lower plane. Our most perceptive choral instructors—most of them reside in the North, where they have had their judgment refined in the competition movement—look upon a choir as an instrument ready to interpret, in the most perceptive and subtle way possible, everything there is in the music and words of a choral song. The type of expressiveness in the singing—and even the colour of voice used—should match the atmosphere of the piece. There should be warmth or restraint where properly demanded; phrasing and rhythm should be in character with the music; and every point of technique should be thoroughly mastered in order that the imaginative intent may have free play; and in general the æsthetic level both of music and of performance should be comparable to that of, say, chamber music and song-singing at their best. The difference between this and the Continental conception of choral singing may be somewhat hastily summarised by saying that what is a means to the end in the former is made an end in the latter.

Perhaps the best opportunity for comparing the two standards was afforded at the Paris International Competitions of 1912. Here some of our best small choirs sang in series with some of the best that France and Belgium could offer. Taking the competition for mixed-voice choirs as an instance, the one test-piece—prescribed by the French authorities, and which all sang in common—was an index of the choral ideals which the choirs were expected to satisfy. It was thoroughly melodramatic and superficial. Its aim was to afford opportunities for small and clever effects that tickle the ear and excite the senses. The English choirs were out of their element here, finding their true scope in intensifying the beauty and dignity of works by Bantock, Morley, Bruch, Elgar, and Cornelius. A choir from Ghent gave a trenchant reading of the set test, and proceeded to deal in similar racy fashion with a piece by Palestrina! For this they were awarded the first prize. The Parisian attitude to this type of choral feat seemed to be one of deep and earnest admiration, as for an art-form of great virtue. The same festival of choralism brought to notice a male-voice choir from Prague that seemed to reach the limit of super-excellence in the minutiae of technique; their singing was startling, extraordinarily pleasing, but not moving. It is not right to condemn this Continental way wholesale. Due respect should be paid to its intensity and vivacity, and to the perseverance that must go to its making. It is simply that our ideals are different, and that to us they naturally seem to rank higher.

The Ukrainian singing showed us the Continental way with a vengeance, and all credit be to M. Alexander Kochitz, the conductor, for his expertness in bringing the choir to such a standard. There was something fascinating in his singular command over the choir and in the alertness and unity of his singers. One of the first impressions gained was that of an unusual range of finely-graded tone, from the various shades of pianissimo to various degrees of fortissimo. Dynamic effects crowded one upon another, and each must have meant special study and practice. The attack was instantaneous, and so was the release—a rarer accomplishment. The tone was impressive when loud, very winning when soft; the basses made some novel and peculiarly satisfying effects when they sang in octaves, sometimes down to a low B flat! This was the stock-in-trade with which, by their wonderful technique, M. Kochitz and his singers captivated all listeners. One entered into a mood that ignored the shrillness of the sopranos, the hardness of the tenors, and the general consciousness that the chords were not in tune, and the insignificance of most of the music. At times one could revel in the lovely unctuousness of a male solo, or the hectic wrath with which a phrase would be hurled out in a piece that, according to the programme translation, was all sweetness and smiles. Of course only vague ideas could be seized of the intentions of the music in relation to the words. The pieces were in general either uneventfully rhapsodical or bright and well-knit. The repertory, from which it was not easy to pick out the matter in hand, specified hymns, Christmas carols, Spring songs (arranged by Lyssenko), and folk-songs.

This somewhat narrow scheme of music grew out of the nationalistic aims which led to the choir's formation. From the programme we learn that:

The Ukrainian Ministry of Education has created a Musical Section, whose chief aim consists in cultivating Ukrainian music, with all its native beauty and richness, and giving it an artistic and healthy direction. The section has been entrusted with the duty of finding the ethnographic musical material, to publish the folk-songs already known, to watch over the development of the musical cult in schools of all types, and especially in primary schools, to publish manuals on the Theory of Singing, to organise courses for conductors and, moreover, to found and to support, materially and morally, choirs of all types—but especially the 'National Choirs.'

During 1916-17 a number of these National Choirs sprang up in the towns of the Ukraine, and in 1918 these were affiliated to the First National Choir, which was formed at Kiev. The Bolshevik invasion caused the National Ukrainian Choir to leave for Kamenely; thence it travelled to Galicia, and entered upon the European tour which at length brought it to England.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY

It is good news that this Society, whose activities were suspended in 1916, is to resume its work. During its thirteen years of existence before the war the choir made a reputation for good singing, and for programmes that avoided the beaten track. Many new works are to its credit, and some valuable revivals. According to the circular sent out by Mr. Arthur Fagge, rehearsals commenced on February 12, and at the time of its writing, more voices were required. Applications are received by the secretary, London Choral Society, c/o Messrs. Ibbes & Tillett, 19, Hanover Square, W.1.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY

The Royal Albert Hall was exceptionally crowded on the afternoon of February 14, when the Royal Choral Society gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' in full. Both the popularity of the music and the high quality of the solo singing helped to add success to the occasion. Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Herbert Brown each won ready approval for the fine vocal quality and expressiveness they threw into their work. The choral singing under Sir Frederick Bridge was marked by the efficiency and rich volume that have always been characteristic of the Society's achievements. Organ support was, as usual, supplied by Mr. H. L. Balfour.

BEDFORD.—The performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' on January 27, under Dr. H. A. Harding's guidance, showed the Musical Society at its pre-war standard. The choral tone was good, and the singing had colour and vitality. Miss Gwladys Naish, Miss Elsie Chambers, Mr. William Heseltine, and Mr. John Huntingdon were the soloists.

BLACKBURN.—A programme of some distinction was chosen by the Blackburn Ladies' Choir for its concert on January 26. Included in the scheme were Holst's 'Tears, idle tears,' Colin Taylor's 'The desire,' Vaughan Williams's 'Sound sleep,' Mackenzie's 'The earth and man,' and Percy Buck's 'Dawn,' all of which were adequately sung under Mr. F. Duckworth's direction.

CHELSEA.—An excellent concert was given at Chelsea Town Hall, on January 28, by Miss Amy McDowall's ladies' choir. The programme included Bantock's 'The happy Isle,' an excerpt, 'What means this sadness,' from Moussorgsky's 'Salambo,' and a costume cantata entitled 'The fugitive Cavalier,' especially written for the choir by Pauline Barrett and Ernest Cox. Great pleasure was given by the singing of the choir throughout the evening.

CHILDE OKEFORD.—A very successful concert was given recently by the Childe Okeford and District Choral Class, under the direction of Mr. T. A. Bevis. The Epilogue from 'The Banner of St. George,' Pinsuti's 'Good-night, Beloved,' a 'Lullaby' by Mr. Bevis, and other part-songs were sung in a way that afforded great satisfaction. The same programme was repeated at Okeford Fitzpaine on February 11, with similar success.

CHISWICK AND GUNNERSBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—Although this Society had continued its activities during the war, with much depleted numbers, by giving assistance on behalf of charitable and philanthropic movements, it was on January 26, at Chiswick Town Hall, that it opened its fourteenth regular season with Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast,' in the presence of a very large and enthusiastic audience. The choir, numbering ninety, distinguished itself in both works by good tone, clear enunciation, and careful expression. The soloists, who all did well, were Misses Daisy and Winifred Collins, and Mr. John Cogswell. Mr. David M. Davis conducted.

COLNE.—The Clef Club held a 'Norwegian Night' on January 28. The Colne Orpheus Glee Union, under Mr. L. Greenwood, gave 'Young Magnus,' by Grondhal, 'Ormen Lange,' by F. A. Reissiger, and (Anglice) 'Recognition of Land,' by Grieg. The activities of this Club, carried out under Mr. C. H. Bateson's directorship, seem to be enterprising and resourceful.

DEVIZES.—The Devizes Musical Association, which was inactive during the war, resumed its concerts on February 2 with a performance of the 'Faust' concert-selection. The choir of about sixty voices gave a spirited interpretation under Mr. H. H. Baker's direction. Solo parts were taken by Miss Hilda Eager, Mr. W. Farrand, and Dr. Sydney Cole.

FAULHOUSE.—A performance of Haydn's 'Creation' was given by the Fauldhouse Choral Society at Fauldhouse on February 11. The work of the choir was excellent, and the soloists were Miss Phyllis Graves, Mr. Henry Brearley, and Mr. Philip Malcolm. An efficient orchestra was led by Mr. W. Watt Jupp, and Mr. T. Sommerville conducted.

GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY MUSICAL SOCIETY.—The Male-Voice Choir of this organization re-appeared—after six years of inactivity—at the concert given on February 4 at the Hamilton Hall. Among many popular choral pieces, chief place was taken by the 'Cries of London,' by Herbert Oliver, who had specially arranged the parts for male-voices. Solos in this work were given by Miss Lillian Stilés-Allen.

HAMPSTEAD GARDEN SUBURB.—The Hampstead Garden Suburb Choral Society showed its vitality at Central Hall, Westminster, on January 28. Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was sung with spirit and good tone under Mr. Francis Hamblin, and the second part of the programme included German's 'O peaceful night,' Eaton Fanning's 'The Vagabonds,' and (for the orchestra) Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Mozart's 'Figaro' Overture, and a Purcell Suite.

HANLEY.—On the resignation of Mr. E. C. Redfern, the appointment of conductor to the North Staffs District Choral Society has been given temporarily to Lt. Sydney H. Weale. This Society is preparing 'The Dream of Gerontius' for performance on March 26 with the Hallé Orchestra, Mr. Hamilton Harty conducting.

IPSWICH.—The standard attained by the Ipswich Male-Voice Choir, under the direction of Mr. J. Job, was illustrated on January 27 by a programme that included three of Elgar's songs from the Greek Anthology, Reger's 'The Call of Spring,' Hegar's 'The Phantom Host,' Cecil Forsyth's cantata 'Kubla Khan,' Sullivan's 'The long day closes,' and Brahms's 'Alto Rhapsody.' The wide expressive range of these works was successfully encompassed, and the choir moreover showed good technical grounding. The solo singer in the Rhapsody was Madame Kirkby Lunn.

MAIDSTONE.—Great credit is due to the Maidstone Choral Union for the policy of enterprise which it carries out under the direction of Mr. F. Wilson Parish, and the high standard of ability it brings to its work. On January 20 this body undertook no less a work than Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius,' and performed it with unqualified success. The chorus singing, supported by an orchestra of over forty, had both the volume and expressive vitality that the music demands. The occasion was further distinguished by the presence of Mr. Gervase Elwes to interpret the part of Gerontius. Miss Olga Haley sang the music of the Angel, and Mr. Neville Fletcher the bass solos.

MANCHESTER.—The second concert of the Manchester Vocal Society, on February 4, provided admirable performances of Weelkes's 'As Vesta was,' Bach's 'Death, I do not fear thee' (from 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure'), Robertson's 'An Eriskay love-lilt,' German's 'Rolling down to Rio,' Elgar's 'Evening scene,' and Cornelius's 'Song of the dance,' under the direction of Dr. Thomas Keighley.

PAR (CORNWALL).—The newly-formed Par Festival Chorus gave 'Messiah' to general satisfaction on February 10, at the Picturedrome, St. Blazey. Both choir and orchestra did their work creditably under Mr. C. S. Edwards's direction. The solos were taken by Miss May Burley, Madame Leo Knucky, Mr. Aldrovand Maynard, and Mr. A. Ernest Old.

Chamber Music for Amateurs

[Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur chamber musicians who wish to get into touch with other players. We shall be glad if those making use of the scheme will let us know when their announcements have borne fruit. Failing such notice, advertisements will be inserted three times.]

Lady viola player seeks chamber music or orchestral practice in S.W. district, Streatham or Brixton preferred.—'OMEGA,' c/o Musical Times.

Viola and clarinet player wishes to join in practice of any kind of good music. Most evenings free. Within two miles of Charing Cross.—CLARIVIOLA, c/o Musical Times.

Pianist wishes to join chamber music party. He is also a clarinet player.—WILLIAM ROLLISON, 104, Cadogan Terrace, Victoria Park, E.9.

Violinist wishes to join trio or quartet party. Leeds district.—RICHARD P. STEAD, 8, Thornhill Terrace, Wortley, Leeds.

Pianist desires to form quartet for study of good music. Violinists and 'cellist. Any afternoon or evening. N., N.E., or N.W. district preferred.—N. V. C., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist wishes to join a small party of musicians (string quartet or otherwise) for practice of good chamber music—not too difficult. Would lend band parts. West London preferred.—ERNEST A. COUSINS, 160, St. Albans Avenue, Bedford Park, W.

Violinist wishes to meet players for study of classical trios or quartets. Must be good players. He would also like to join a good musical society in Norwood or district. Any afternoon or evening.—CREMONA, c/o Musical Times.

A splendid opportunity for recital work in a well known Central London Church is offered to a really competent string quartet and vocal quartet. Beautiful building with fine acoustic properties: easily accessible by tube, train, tram, or bus. A room in the crypt, containing a grand pianoforte, is available for rehearsals. It is hoped to arrange (week-day) monthly recitals of classical chamber music and unaccompanied motets, &c.—F. G. P., 52, Primrose Mansions, Battersea Park, S.W. 11.

The annual Spring Festival of the London Sunday School Choir will be held on March 27, at 6.30, at the Royal Albert Hall, under the direction of Mr. William Whiteman. The choir and orchestra will consist of twelve hundred adult performers, and Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Emlyn Edwards, and Mr. Robert Radford have been engaged as soloists. The programme includes selections from Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' Rossini's 'Moses in Egypt,' Sullivan's choral epilogue, 'God sent His messenger the rain,' from 'The Golden Legend,' anthems, choruses, and part-songs, with selections by the orchestra of a hundred and forty performers, under the direction of Mr. Wesley Hammet.

Church and Organ Music

THE EVOLUTION OF THE MODERN ORGAN*

BY LIEUT.-COL. GEORGE DIXON

For Great chorus reeds the author recommends open reed stops of the French type on about 6-in. pressure. The present writer, after careful observation, considers this class of tone to be so cutting as to destroy the flue-work character of the full Great, and finds that closed reeds of the Willis type give a far better effect on the open soundboard. Even in Willis's Great organs, however, the flue-work is not always sufficiently dominating to maintain the necessary contrast in timbre between the full Great and full Swell. This deficiency is especially noticeable when the 16-ft. reed is included—a register by no means indispensable to the former, but absolutely essential in some shape to the latter. On the Great the flue-work must be paramount, just as the Chorus reeds are the glory of the Swell. In the Swell department the French type of register is most useful, and makes an effective contrast when the smoother-toned Willis reeds are present on the Great. It is interesting to note that the present firm have used open reeds in one or two instances in their recent organ for Dunedin Cathedral.

The author appears to believe that spotted metal or pure tin tubes are essential for fine reed tone. In most of Willis's later work zinc was freely employed in the 16-ft. octaves, and the remaining pipes were not always of spotted metal. In several cases known to the writer the quality of tone was actually superior to similar examples where spotted metal had been used throughout. It is a little strange that the author makes no reference to the modern practice of loading the reed tongues which Willis developed so scientifically, if indeed he did not actually originate it. This method has been still further developed since his day. The author makes some valuable remarks on the more purely orchestral reeds, such as oboe, clarinet, cor anglais, &c., and alludes to some fine specimens by Cavallé-Coll in his own organ. He says that the great trouble in the modern organ is that these orchestral registers enclosed in a swell-box lose much of their telling effect, and the power of the accompaniment has in consequence to be unduly cut down, thus taking away the orchestral flavour it is desired to produce. This is undoubtedly true, and is sometimes due to the unfavourable situation of the Solo box, sometimes to insufficient wind-pressure, but more frequently it is caused by the box being too thick. Dr. Alan Gray once drew the writer's attention to this point, and strongly advocated a thinner box for the enclosed Solo. There is certainly a good deal to be said for it. After all, the corresponding instruments in the orchestra are not capable of extreme variations in power, but they are very telling in Solo passages. A thinner box for the Solo would therefore be advantageous except in the case of the Strings, which demand more intense gradation, but could be placed elsewhere.

The author's remark as to the difficulty of saying what is meant by Tuba tone is not quite easy to comprehend. He refers to the 'dome' tubas at St. Paul's on 25-in. wind as unique. But surely the dozens of stops of similar timbre bearing this name which have been voiced by the same hand on pressures of 15-in. and upwards, may truly be said to have set the standard of tuba quality for a long time to come. As the author points out, such stops are of little value unless they will stand out prominently against the full Great; consequently the latter must not be over-reeded, and the former ought not to be enclosed. If such a powerful Solo stop must be placed in a swell-box, the 'trompette harmonique' type with open reeds, and not necessarily on a lower pressure, should be selected. In this position it is far more effective than the pure-toned tuba, the tone-quality of which is ruined by enclosure. As the author points out elsewhere, advantage is not sufficiently taken of the various qualities of tone which can be obtained from open and closed reeds, and from broad and narrow reeds.

In dealing with the Swell it is doubtful whether the author fully appreciates the modern tendency to make the reed work the foundation and the flue-work subsidiary, a feature first exemplified at St. Paul's Cathedral in 1872. This superb full Swell has probably never been surpassed for its size; but even here the effect may be improved by shutting off all the flue-work up to and including 4-ft. pitch.

In modern times the idea has been developed into a 'bombarde' department with a tonal structure consisting of a complete family of heavily-winded reeds and a big mixture—enclosed of course in a swell-box. In Lewis's 'Multum in Parvo' organ at the People's Palace, Mile End Road, such a division on 12-in. wind playable from the Swell and Great was designed about 1886 and still exists. It is also worthy of note that the author's own organ contains a complete family of reeds on heavy wind, including a Quint trumpet 5½-ft.—except for the example in the Ely Cathedral Swell, the only specimen in the United Kingdom of a reed of that pitch. The author appears to advocate the use of a swell-box with as little free space as possible, so as to give the effect of the rush of a hurricane when the shutters open. He consequently deprecates the inclusion of Pedal pipes in the box containing the Swell organ. A properly-designed swell-box, however, should give every pipe ample speaking room, and allow it to be easily accessible for tuning purposes—a point of no small importance. The instrument at St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, affords a most magnificent full Swell crescendo effect. Here the Swell is situated in a room which contains the Pedal 32-ft. reed and the 16-ft. derived from it. The correct bass to the full Swell is thus supplied, and enormously enhances its value.

In dealing with the Pedal organ and its development the author does not appear to approve of the modern plan of borrowing manual doubles to supply a variety of softer pedal stops. It is, of course, quite true, as he says, that you 'lose notes.' In practice, however, it has been proved over and over again that a listener who is unaware of the borrowing does not detect it, because a louder stop is always drawn on the Pedal when the manual double in question is used as such; this effectually covers the borrowing. The plan incidentally makes it worth while to provide the greater wealth and variety of manual 16-ft. stops which the author so rightly advocates. In spite of his remarks on its slowness of speech, the Pedal salicional or dulciana is one of the most beautiful stops, and can be made quite crisp and prompt—witness the fine specimen in Durham Cathedral organ on only 1½-in. wind.

The latter part of the book deals with control, actions, and the mechanical player. With regard to control the author states that if Casson's system were adopted together with certain time-saving devices he describes, the largest organ could be easily manipulated with three manuals only. In fact he shows how it would be possible to pass from a full Great, Swell, and Pedal combination to a Solo stop with its accompaniment and appropriate pedal by touching only two pistons. It is interesting to note that in the instruments at Lincoln Cathedral (1898) and St. Bees Priory Church (1899) accessory stops and combination couplers were devised which render it possible to accomplish this change (providing at the same time the proper Pedal coupler) by merely pressing one piston. This control has been even further developed in more recent instruments. The Casson system applied to any organ would save a great deal of purely routine manipulation of pedal stops and couplers. In fact the player need never think about them, unless he requires some special or Solo effect. In some modern organs the latter is provided for by a reversible piston on the Pedal reed. This has been found useful so far as it goes, inasmuch as it enables a subject to be brought out on the Pedal and the bass resumed when desired. Under the Casson system a variety of Pedal Solo effects can be prepared in advance, brought on and discontinued as required, with the minimum of stop manipulation. There is an interesting discussion as to the most convenient arrangement of the manuals. One of the most important suggestions made is that the Solo tuba should be placed on the Choir manual, so that while playing on the Great single notes can be 'thumbed' by either hand. In the ordinary four-manual this cannot be done unless the somewhat rare Solo to Choir coupler is present.

The author advocates the use of electro-pneumatic action, but he hardly seems to appreciate the perfection to which first-class tubular pneumatic has been brought. He devotes a page to the mechanical player, clearly showing its limitations when applied to the organ.

In conclusion, the author gives a short description and specification of his own five-manual organ, containing over a hundred and twenty speaking stops and couplers. After reading this, and indeed certain other parts of the book, one wonders whether he quite realises that with prices (say) 150 per cent. in advance of pre-war standard, and other restrictions, organ building on a grandiose scale has vanished—at any rate for the present. Now and for some time to come designing organs will become largely a question of obtaining the maximum of resources and effect from a strictly limited number of registers. But that is no reason why future designs should not be complete so far as they go. On this point the author utters some words of wisdom which deserve quotation: 'It has always seemed to me that a Great organ, however small, should be complete. You can never do justice to real organ music on half a Great. You can, however, design a complete Great of even six stops.' As given these include a 16-ft. register, and a Mixture of 3 or 4 ranks. Again: '... reviewing the question of organ design as a whole, I always think it is a mistake to go in for an incomplete instrument. For instance, one with a large Swell, but only half a Great and a deficient Pedal. ... In a small building you will not require so much organ, but what there is should be complete with the proportionate quantity of stops of different pitches.' Specifications and designs would have benefited much if such principles as these had been held steadily in view. In spite of the sundry criticisms which have been made in this article, the subject-matter of the book is on the whole eminently sound. It is thoughtfully written and most suggestive, and deserves careful study by all lovers of the organ whether they be players or listeners.

CONCERNING SILENCE

Under the above title 'Gregory Minim' contributed an article to the Church Times of February 6, from which we are kindly allowed to quote a few passages. The writer is doubly qualified to speak, being a priest and a well-equipped musician:

... Is it out of the way to suggest that many of us, when we attend church, have to endure what could so easily be cured—the untiring restless efforts of every person engaged in the conduct of the services to be doing, or saying, or singing, or playing something? ... Are there not times for silence? ... Have we always to be preached at, or sung to, or preluded or postluded?

No doubt due allowance must be made for the uncontrollable vagaries of the artistic spirit. At the Catechism, a Sunday or two ago, our assistant-organist (aged twelve) out of sheer delight at the magic results achieved by his boyish hands as he played his hymn-tune quite carefully and accurately, at the close of the Amen let his fingers lightly wander into a quite passable extemporization. But it increased in strength and volume until the catechist could hardly hear himself speak. The boy meant well, but he won't do it again. I told him that the fitting season for such alarms and excursions was the practice hour when no one was in church but himself and the blower. His retort might well have been that he was only doing what many grown-up organists do. Which is only too true. Out of sheer dread of what might happen in an interval of silence, readers are played to the lectern and back again to the stall, preachers are waltzed to the pulpit and minuetted to the sanctuary, and even after the Prayer of Consecration (when, according to the wise saying of Bishop John Wordsworth, there should be a 'solemn and awful pause') the devout are fidgeted by the musings of the well-meaning musician at the organ-stool.

We might well seize upon this easy and practical opportunity for reform. There is no question here of the introduction of new tunes or new hymn books or new lectionaries. There are no tender susceptibilities to offend. All I ask is that we should give Christian people a chance to appreciate the inestimable value of silence. ... In the Church services there is a place for music, instrumental and vocal; and there is a place for the saying as well as for the singing, and there is also a place for silence. We need more of the latter than we get. ...

But, apart from those solemn and awful pauses, which would be so good for our souls, there is a place in the Church services for shorter pauses, for which we so often look in vain. To give the impression of haste is to do harm to the majestic offering of prayer and praise. 'Deliberate instancy' is admirable, but there is nothing to admire in fretful fidget. Short pauses, as every actor knows, give point to what follows: they are significant of restraint and self-control. To take one instance: When the opening Versicles and Responses at Mattins or Evensong have been said, the priest should allow time for the congregation to rise and stand up before commencing the Gloria Patri: so, again, after the Dominus vobiscum and Oremus, he should see that the people are on their knees before saying the Lesser Litany. There might well be a short pause before the Sursum Corda and before the final Blessing. Or, again, he might 'bid' the people to pray before each of the Occasional Prayers—'Let us pray for the King's Majesty,' or 'Let us pray for all conditions of men'—and then, after a moment's silence, read the set prayer. These are little points; but they are, I submit, worthy of consideration.

Mr. Godfrey Sceats gave a lecture before the Gregorian Association on January 27, dealing with the use of fauxbourdon in connection with Plain-song chanting. He pointed out that the revival of fauxbourdon is another example of the way musical ideas recur. Plain-song is now being widely used after being comparatively neglected for several centuries, and fauxbourdon, which reached its prime in Tudor times and then languished, is now being revived with the advantage of the added technical knowledge and resources of to-day. Fauxbourdon, he said, is a simple vocal harmonization of, or counterpoint to, a theme generally given to one of the lower voices—usually the tenor. Speaking of the application of the method to the Plain-song psalm-tones, he pointed out that formerly only a few classical examples existed, most of the older composers contenting themselves with a single specimen in each of the eight modes. In collaboration with Capt. Francis Burgess he had recently brought out through Messrs. Novello a collection containing no fewer than a hundred and thirty examples. Some of these were from such writers as Thomas Morley, Bernabei, and La Feille, the remainder were by the compilers. At the close of the lecture, illustrations were sung from the recently published 'Fa-Burden Chant Book,' and furnished convincing proof that vocal harmony can be very effectively used in this way. Undoubtedly the method should do much to remove one of the stock objections choirs make in regard to Plain-song—its excessive call for unison singing.

A Hymn Festival was held at the Church of St. Mary Redcliff, Bristol, on February 14. There was a very large attendance, and under the inspiring lead of Dr. Walford Davies it was shown that the hymn-singing of a congregation can be a vital—even thrilling—thing, instead of the perfunctory affair it is too often allowed to become. A mixed choir, prepared by Mr. Hubert W. Hunt, led the singing, and supplied fauxbourdons to some of the hymns. Mr. Ralph T. Morgan accompanied.

The Ottery St. Mary Choral Society gave an excellent performance of 'Messiah' in the Parish Church on February 10, the band and choir numbering eighty performers. Mr. Stanley Chipperfield conducted. The Society has done good work during the past fourteen years, singing such works as Elgar's 'Black Knight' and Mozart's 'Requiem'—a very creditable record for a country town of little more than three thousand inhabitants.

An Old Choristers' Association has recently been formed in connection with Ripon Cathedral. For the benefit of numerous ex-choirboys of that city who are now scattered over the world, we are asked to draw their attention to the fact, and to ask them to communicate with the hon. secretary, Mr. Arthur Smith, Mallorie Park Drive, Ripon.

We may look for some interesting musical developments at St. Martin-in-the-Fields, where Mr. Martin Shaw has just been appointed master of the music. We understand that Mr. Geoffrey Shaw will take charge of the choir at St. Mary's, Primrose Hill, with Lieut. J. H. Arnold as organist.

'The Creation' was sung at the City Temple on February 14, under the direction of Mr. Allan Brown. The soloists were Miss Bessie Lang, Mr. Henry Turnpenney, and Mr. Samuel Dyson. Mr. G. D. Cunningham presided at the organ.

Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion will be sung, with full orchestral accompaniment, at Southwark Cathedral on March 20, at 3. No tickets are required for admission.

This Anthem, which is taken from the setting of the Burial Sentences in Thomas Tomkins's Musica Deo Sacra (1668), is there printed in the key of D minor. A note in the Errata page of the Organ part to that work shows, however, that the pitch of the organs of that day was almost exactly a minor 3rd higher than the present low pitch. The printed voice parts and Pars Organica are not very accurate, nor is their use of accidentals consistent, so that there is occasionally room for doubt. I think, however, that the present text may be taken as accurately representing the composer's intentions. Here and there I have made some slight changes in the placing of the words. I. A.

Mr. Edmund West, St. John's, Territet, Switzerland—Sonata No. 19, Rheinberger; Violin and Organ, Sonata No. 4, Handel; Slow Movement from Sonata No. 2, Bach; (Baron Henri van Heeckeren). Soprano solos, 'Ave Maria,' Frank; 'Domine, adjutor meus,' Saint-Saëns (Madame Elsa Michling).

APPOINTMENTS

Lieut. Ernest C. Edwards, organist and choirmaster, St. Peter's Episcopal Church, Peterhead.

Mr. William G. Goodway, organist and choirmaster, St. Michael's, Wandsworth Common.

Mr. Arthur W. Morrison, organist and choirmaster, St. John's, Ranmoor, Sheffield.

Dr. W. John Reynolds, organist and choirmaster, The Collegiate Church of the Holy Trinity, Stratford-on-Avon.

Letters to the Editor

A PARRY MEMORIAL

SIR,—It is proposed to set up in Gloucester Cathedral a public memorial to Sir Hubert Parry. No words are needed as to the fitness of such a memorial, or the suitability of placing it in the Cathedral near which he lived and in which many of his finest works were first performed. The consent of the Dean and Chapter has been obtained. We therefore issue an appeal to all who hold his name in remembrance, who have been bound to him by ties of personal attachment, or desire to show their recognition of the great services which he rendered to the music of this country.

Any surplus funds remaining after completion of the memorial will be devoted to a musical purpose to be decided on by a small committee. Subscriptions may be sent to The Hon. Norah Dawnay, 29, Oxford Square, W. 2.

INQUIRY FOR OLD SONG SETTINGS

SIR,—I should be very grateful if you or any of your readers could trace for me two songs:

(1.) An English setting of Rossetti's 'Fly away, oh my heart, away,' with an arpeggio accompaniment, and refrain at the end of each verse, 'Then said the eldest one—fly away, oh my heart, away, for I have heard the drum, so sweet, so low.' I have heard this sung, but cannot find out if, and where, it is published.

(2.) A setting of an old Scotch ballad, 'Lord Lovell he stood at his castle gate, a-combing his coal-black steed,' and called, I fancy, 'The Lady Hancibell.'—Yours, &c.,

THE DRUM IN PAPUA

SIR,—I am sending you a photograph of Papuan drum-beaters which may be of interest to your readers.

The Papuan drum is of a curiosity. Its making is usually performed alone in the forest by a youth just reaching manhood, and is the occasion for many ceremonies. The wood is native, of a hard and resonant kind; one end is left open, the other covered with iguana skin, tightly stretched and bound. The player beats his drum after the manner shown in the photograph. The sound is remarkably musical, and the execution of the drummer much above anything that a white player can manage with a similar instrument. The drum is the Papuan's chief delight, and the only musical instrument he can make, with the exception of a rude one-note trumpet, contrived by breaking a hole in the great 'trumpet-shell' of the reefs. Nevertheless, when he gets European instruments he can do well with them. European drums are his passion. I do not think the Papuan's idea of heaven would be complete without a big bass drum or two. Brass band instruments afford him the highest musical pleasure of which he is capable. He is worked up to screams and stampings of delight by the sound of a good brass band—the louder the better; and he can do quite a good deal himself with brass, under good teaching.

The Catholic Mission of Yule Island, Papua (a Mission once supported by France and Belgium, but now exceedingly impoverished), is anxious to introduce brass band playing among the cannibals of the main range, where much of their work is done. It is found that brass instruments subdue much of the dangerous energy of these people, and supply the excitement and amusement formerly furnished by a head-hunting raid. When Christianised, and consequently induced to cease from hunting, cooking, and eating his neighbour, the wild Papuan of the hills is apt to find life a trifle dull, and the Catholic Mission of Yule Island, with characteristic common-sense, sets itself to fill the gap as far as possible.

If any reader of the Musical Times has any good noisy brass or other instrument that he has no farther use for, he may be assured that it will do excellent missionary work at the far ends of the earth, if he will take the trouble of sending it, carriage paid, by any of the parcel agencies, or by parcel post, according to size, to Yule Island, Papua.

I have visited the cannibal districts of the main range, and stayed in the villages recently Christianised, while everywhere surrounded by places not yet under Mission influence. I can speak from personal experience of the excellent results of the work done by the Fathers, Brothers, and Sisters of the Mission, which permitted a solitary white woman, unattended except by native carriers, to make a journey of several days in perfect safety through these places.

It is the cannibal tribes in particular (and very good fellows they are) who love noisy band instruments. They are also the best singers, and can sing in four parts (when taught) with excellent effect.—Yours, &c.,

BEATRICE GRIMSHAW.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

PERCY FRENCH, at Liverpool, on January 24, after a brief illness. Born in 1854, the second son of Christopher French, D.L., Cloonyquin, Co. Roscommon, he commenced as a student of engineering in Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated B.A., and C.E.; he practised his profession for six years. In 1879 he drifted into journalism, music, and art, and edited a comic journal. Music had always been a hobby, but he took it up professionally in 1881, and composed about thirty songs to his own words, of which 'The Mountains of Morne' is the best known. In 1891 he collaborated with the Rev. Dr. Collisson in a 'comedy opera' entitled 'The Knight of the Road,' followed by two similar trifles, and in 1905 he produced a Christmas fairy-play entitled 'Noah's Ark,' at the Waldorf Theatre. From 1900 onwards he gave most interesting monologue entertainments, and also exhibited his own water-colours, one of which had been specially painted for King Edward VII. For the past few years he was in indifferent health, and received a Civil List pension. He was twice married, and leaves two daughters.

W. A. H. COLLISSON, on January 31, suddenly, at Hawarden. Whether as organist, musical entertainer, or hard-working clergyman, this versatile and popular musician deserves to be held in memory, if only for the opportunity he afforded 'the man in the street' of hearing some of the great world artists, at his Dublin Popular Concerts, Belfast Popular Concerts, London

Saturday Evening' Concerts, Cork Popular Concerts, and Londonderry Popular Concerts. Born at Dublin on May 20, 1865, Dr. Collisson made his début as a budding organist under the baton of Dr. Grattan Flood, at St. Peter's, Belfast, in 1880, and was subsequently organist at Trim, Bray, Rathfarnham (1885-95), and St. George's, Dublin (1895-98). Having graduated B.A. and Mus. D. at Dublin University, he studied for the Anglican ministry; was ordained at Truro Cathedral in 1898, and appointed curate at St. Saviour's, Chelsea, in 1901. As a composer he won prizes at the Feis Ceoil in 1898 and 1903, and wrote three operettas, two cantatas, a Mass, and numerous songs. His métier, however, was as a musical entertainer, in which he collaborated for many years with Percy French, whose death, recorded above, affected him deeply. On January 30 he left London for Hawarden to afford a musical evening to ex-service men, and died suddenly on the following day.

J. H. MAUNDER, the composer of the popular Church cantata 'Olivet to Calvary.' He held posts as organist and choir-master at St. Paul's, Forest Hill; St. Matthew's, Sydenham; St. Michael's, Blackheath; and Christ Church, Sutton; and was actively interested in various musical organizations. His compositions included other popular Church cantatas—'Penitence, Pardon, and Peace,' 'Song of Thanksgiving,' and 'The Martyrs'—that almost rivalled 'Olivet to Calvary' in popularity; also a comic opera, 'The Superior Sex,' services, anthems, and part-songs.

JOHN VARLEY ROBERTS, the well-known Church musician, on February 9. For many years he was a familiar figure in the musical life of Oxford, where as organist and instructor of the choristers at Magdalen College Chapel he won a wide reputation for his conspicuous skill in choir-training and for the exemplary musical standard of the services held under his guidance. He was born at Stanningley, near Leeds, in September, 1841, and obtained his first post as organist at St. John's Church, Farsley, at the age of twelve. He was at St. Bartholomew's, Armley, from 1862 to 1868, then at Halifax Parish Church until 1882. Here he composed the anthem 'Seek ye the Lord,' which became known throughout the kingdom. He took up his duties at Magdalen in 1882, when Sir Walter Parratt proceeded to Windsor, and carried out his work with distinction until his recent retirement. During the same period he was organist at St. Giles's Church, Oxford (1885-93). He was the founder and first conductor of the University Glee and Madrigal Society, he conducted the Oxford Choral and Philharmonic Society, gave professional lectures, and examined for musical degrees. He composed an oratorio, 'Jonah'; three Church cantatas—'Advent,' 'Incarnation,' and 'Passion'; services, and a number of anthems. He edited the 'Parish Church Chant Book,' and wrote a treatise on a practical method of training choristers. He took his Mus. Bac. degree in 1871, and his doctorate in 1876.

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of March, 1860 :

LIMERICK CATHEDRAL.—Wanted, Two Choir Boys ready trained, with good voices for solos and leading parts; of unquestionable character and respectability. They will live with the Rev. the Chanter of the Cathedral; be clothed; and receive a first-rate classical and English education, with every care and attention, as the sons of gentlemen. A prize of £5, in books or money, given each Christmas to the best and most efficient boy in the choir, or between the two best in such proportions as the Dean may decide. For the above vacancies none need apply but really nice boys, with superior voices, who can read music well. Immediate application to the Dean of Limerick.

NOTICE.—MR. SIMS REEVES' NEW SONG. MARGARETTA, by BALFE, which has created such an extraordinary sensation, is now ready (in two keys), price 2s. 6d. In the press, Arrangements of Margaretta, by BRINLEY RICHARDS and LAURENT. Boosey and Sons, Holles-street.

HACKNEY.—A series of performances of the favourite oratorios, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Monk, has been inaugurated here with great success, and supported by large audiences, principally consisting of the gentry of the neighbourhood.

VOCAL ASSOCIATION.—The first concert this season given by the Vocal Association took place at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday, under the direction of M. Benedict. The programme commenced with Mendelssohn's hymn, 'Hear my prayer'—the first time of performance. . . . The principal interest of the evening centred in the choir. Since last year, a very marked improvement has taken place in their performance. The numbers are reduced, but the best singers are retained, and the style in which they executed the part-songs and choruses deserved the highest praise; the light and shade were remarkably well preserved, especially the piano passages, for the forte parts were not loud enough. Two hundred Germans singing that same music would have produced double the sound. The great defect is that the male voices overpower the female singers; there is not enough tune heard.

WHITBY.—On the 14th ult., a concert was given in St. Hilda's Hall, by Mr. Mercer, assisted by his two daughters, grand-daughter, two grand-sons, and a great-grand-son. The programme consisted of songs, duets, and divertissements. The instruments of the party consisted of a pianoforte, harmonium, two violins, and a cornet. The music was executed with much care, and showed a considerable amount of practice.

PURCELL'S 'FAIRY QUEEN' AT THE NEW THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE

'... Yes; he drops the stuff on the wrong girl's eyes, so when she wakes of course she falls in love with Lysander, or Demetrius—I forget which. Anyway, of course, it's the wrong one. . . . Bottom, the weaver johnny, somehow develops a donkey's head . . . sort of fairy-tale, what? . . . They work the oracle so that when Titania wakes the first thing she sees is that silly ass, so of course . . .'

It seems incredible, but it is a fact that two groups of well-dressed people hard by me in the stalls found it necessary to call on one of their number for a running explanation of the story of 'A Midsummer Night's Dream.' And yet this annoying stage whisper was somehow in keeping at the first performance for a couple of centuries of some of the best music of one of our greatest and most neglected composers. How many musicians know enough of Purcell to be able to throw stones at other folk for their ignorance of Shakespeare? And this early opera itself is a reminder that English people of the Restoration had little or no use for the poet. They probably thought, like the French, that he was a barbarian. They did not realise, for example, that the scenes in which Bottom and the other rude mechanicals appear contain some of the most inspired fooling ever devised. They thought it low, and preferred the comedy of Wycherley & Co.—which was certainly 'high'.

The adapter who set out to make 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' acceptable to Restoration tastes did most of his adapting with an axe, the result being an irresponsible medley beside which a modern revue is fairly coherent. If we are not bothered by the lack of continuity it is because when Shakespeare is off Purcell is on, and we can so easily be happy with either. Box and Cox never dodged each other more neatly than do Shakespeare and Purcell in the 'Fairy Queen.' On the whole, the music, not the play, was the thing, and the honours in bulk went to the musicians rather than to the actors. This was natural enough, for there are more people able to sing at least acceptably than to act even tolerably, especially when the acting includes one of the most difficult of arts—that of speaking poetical blank verse. With about a score of soloists, it was inevitable that a considerable distance separated the best from the least good. But on the whole, and bearing in mind that most of the songs make considerable technical demands, besides being in an unfamiliar idiom, a good average level was reached. The best were first-rate; my disinclination to begin to single out individuals from a very long and hardworking cast will, I hope, be understood. The chorus was excellent, with bright, fresh tone and plenty of vitality. The orchestra also did well, the strings playing with delightful delicacy—perhaps they were too consistently delicate. The heroes who wrestled with the old trumpet parts succeeded only approximately. But as our best professional players can never wholly subdue the obsolete instrument when it has fairly been given its head, we need not be surprised if amateurs have some uncomfortable moments. On this occasion most of us were so appreciative of what may be called the sporting aspect that unexpected notes mattered less than usual. Dr. Cyril Rootham conducted, and is to be particularly commended for the excellence of the band's accompanying. The dancing, grouping, and lighting were admirable. The stage managers were Messrs. Edward Dent and John Steegmann, and the production was in the hands of Capt. Clive Carey. The audiences at all six performances were large and enthusiastic, and the revival as a whole was greeted with a remarkable chorus of praise from all quarters, the critics falling over one another in their haste to give it good words. When they do agree . . .

Having been taken down from the shelf, the 'Fairy Queen' must stay down. Music so full of tune and humour is too good to be lost a second time.

We have lately heard a good deal as to the possibilities of an English Ballet. We saw the thing in embryo at Cambridge. Two of the successes of the Russian season were 'La Boutique Fantasque' and 'The Good-humoured Ladies,' the music being warmed-up selections from Rossini and Scarlatti respectively. There is enough delightful music in the 'Fairy Queen' and other forgotten dramatic works of Purcell to furnish forth half a dozen of such ballets. Now is the time for a few choregraphic experts to act together. English Ballet could not start more fitly than by giving one hand to Purcell and the other to English Folk-dance.

LOUGHBOROUGH

On Tuesday, January 27, Mr. William Wooding Starmer, the well-known authority on bells and bell music, at the invitation of the Mayor and Corporation of Loughborough, lectured on 'Carillons and Bell Music' at the Town Hall to a very large and enthusiastic audience. The occasion was in connection with the War Memorial Scheme which has been decided upon by a plebiscite vote, and consists of the erection of a tower to contain a carillon of forty-two bells—with clavier. The tower will be of Gothic design, about 120 feet in height, and will be built on an excellent site in the public park. The largest bell will weigh not less than three tons, and the approximate total cost will be £12,000.

Mr. Starmer ably set forth the claims of bells as musical instruments, explained the technicalities of carillon construction, and gave a number of musical illustrations which were much appreciated by his audience. He claimed that the carillon with clavier was the most democratic instrument in existence for educating the people in and cultivating their love for folk-songs, and for teaching them the great melodies of their fatherland. The music best suited to the carillon—excepting that specially written for it—included the folk-songs which had successfully withstood the test of time. No place in the world of bell-music had, he said, greater claims than Loughborough, for its famous foundry was the birthplace of some of the finest bells in existence. Loughborough will thus be the first town in England to possess a carillon of ample compass and proportions—an instrument that will satisfy the most exacting demands of the greatest carillonners.

SPALDING

On Wednesday, February 11, at the invitation of the Spalding War and Victory Memorials Committee, Mr. Starmer lectured to a crowded audience on 'Chimes and Carillons.' He pointed out that the nature of the surrounding country was particularly suitable for the effective use of a carillon, as it very much resembled the districts in Flanders where bell playing was heard to the greatest advantage. Spalding was the first place in England to initiate a scheme which would probably include a public clock with quarter-chimes and chime-tunes, in addition to a carillon of three octaves chromatic with clavier. The bells will be properly placed in a specially constructed tower, which will replace the present bell turret of the Corn Exchange—a position with plenty of open space about it at the head of the Market Square. The project has been most successfully dealt with by Dr. Pickworth Farrow, who has already secured the promise of twenty of the required bells.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

The students' organ recital on Monday, February 2, showed that amongst the pupils of the Academy are a number of young and able organists—male and female. The recital opened with an excellent performance of Bach's brilliant D major Fugue, played by Mr. Malcolm Boyle (Goss Scholar), while the same composer's B minor Fugue came later in the programme, and was admirably played by Miss Florence Cook. The other items included Chorale in B minor, César Franck (Miss Joan MacNeill), Scherzoso and Passacaglia, Rheinberger (Mr. Ronald Chamberlain), and a Choral Prelude by Hubert Parry (Mr. Reginald Paul). The programme also included several songs, of which one of the most interesting was Verdi's 'O Don Fatale,' sung by Miss Gladys Rolfe, while Miss Molly M. Halse gave an excellent recitation from Shakespeare's 'Coriolanus.'

A chamber concert was given on Monday afternoon, February 16, the programme of which included several items of more than ordinary interest. Among these were Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concerto for pianoforte, flute, and violin, accompanied by the Junior Orchestra under Mr. Spencer Dyke, the soloists being Misses Cicely Hoyer, Mary Underwood, and Dorothy Chalmers. Schumann's Adagio and Allegro for pianoforte and horn (Op. 70), played by Miss Nina North and Mr. Francis Bradley, two movements from Dvorák's String Quartet in D minor, a Sonatina for pianoforte by J. B. McEwen (Miss Olga Mills), an Air, Variations, and Finale by Sydney Rosenbloom (Mr. Harry Isaacs), and Sarasate's 'Zigeunerweisen' played by Mr. Paul Beard. The programme also included songs by Eric Coates, Edward Elgar, and the Terzetto, 'Gratias agimus,' from Rossini's Messa Solenne.

An interesting course of four lectures upon 'Bach and his Period' has been given by Dr. H. W. Richards on Wednesday afternoons, extending from January 28 to February 18. The following is a synopsis of the several lectures: Lecture I.—Musical criticism—Tradition—The Bach family—Bach's career—The Weimar period—The origin of modern fingering—Bach as a teacher. The lecturer played as illustrations, Organ Toccata in D minor, and the great Fantasia in G minor.

Lectures II. and III. dealt with the history and meaning of the 'Wohltemperirte Clavier'—The system of tuning—The construction of Fugues. At both of these lectures illustrations were played by Mr. Harold Craxton, and included Fugues from the 'Forty-eight,' and also the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue.

Lecture IV. dealt with Bach's Choral Works, the B minor Mass, and the two great Passions according to St. John and St. Matthew, with illustrations sung by the Choral class, conducted by Mr. Henry Beauchamp, Miss Chaplin playing the viola da gamba.

The annual general meeting of the R.A.M. Club was held on Saturday evening, January 31, when Mr. Stewart Macpherson was elected president, and Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Dr. Eaton Faning, Messrs. Myles B. Foster, and Robert Radford the new vice-presidents. Messrs. Victor Booth, Frederick Keel, Charles Reddie, and Douglas Redman were elected to the committee.

The Lent Term ends on Saturday, March 27, and the usual orchestral concert will take place at Queen's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, March 23.

THE MUSICAL ASSOCIATION 'WOMEN AND MUSIC'

Mr. James Swinburne's paper, 'Women and Music,' read on January 13, proved to contain much matter for discussion. He took the line that the generally accepted idea that women were the musical sex was wrong, and that until it was given up England would remain an unmusical country. He did not desire to belittle their attainments, or to deny that there were able women musicians; but in discussing half mankind it was necessary to generalise. Brain power was coupled with large brain, and men had on the average larger brains than women, and their brains used more and richer blood. Intellect might be divided broadly into two kinds—Receptive and Productive. Everyone had both types of mind, but the proportions varied as well as the quantities of each. The receptive mind involved what was called a good memory; the productive mind not only possessed that, but its characteristic was that it compared facts or ideas and developed new ones. Women had nearly always the receptive mind only, while the productive was almost peculiar to men, though a very large proportion had receptive minds only. Women were behind in composition, and shone best as pure executants. They had done nothing in any mental branch of music. The cultivation of music by women not only did not help the art in its development, it kept it back actively. Women took no interest in the art as such; they were concerned solely with their own performances. They did not explore music for themselves; they only took up what they had heard before. They did not read the musical papers, still less did they read musical books, which was the reason why there was so little musical literature in this country, nothing compared with that in Germany, where men devoted attention to music. The assumption that women were musical had two main effects. It wasted the time of innumerable women, but the greater evil was that parents thought their daughters should be instructed in music and not their sons. Small boys were thus left, and one may hear men regretting in later life that they were never taught.

Following the paper was an animated discussion, the chairman (Dr. J. E. Borland), Dr. Yorke Trotter, and others warmly controverting the lecturer's assertions.

'WHY NOT BRITISH BALLET?'

At the meeting on February 10 Mr. Mark E. Perugini read a paper entitled 'Why not British Ballet?' He said that ballet had been looked upon as a sort of Cinderella among the arts, and so for the most part had lacked contemporary and copious chroniclers. Its records were few and meagre, yet there had been periods in the past two centuries when it was so popular a spectacle as to amount almost to a public craze, viz., in the 18th century, in the famous 'forties of last century, and finally in our own. It was really made up of four main elements—dancing, miming, music, and scenic effect or décor. The majority of people who talked of ballet seemed to think that it was only made of dancing, whereas it was a composite art of which dancing was only one of its salient elements. The Greeks were practically the first to bring to perfection a natural school of dancing. They did mime, but the art of miming was really less developed by them than later it became by the Romans, more especially during the decline of the Empire. On the fall of Rome, both dancing and miming suffered, and it was not until towards the end of the 15th century that the first impetus towards a revival of dancing came about. This was in 1489, when a great fête organized by Bergonzio di Botta was held at Milan in honour of the marriage of the Duke of Milan with Isabella of Aragon. This was a banquet every course of which was introduced by dancers who entered to musical accompaniment, the whole forming practically a banquet-ballet into which a mythical story was woven. It was from this that we got the word 'entrée,' and when the Maitre de Ballet of to-day spoke of dancers making their entrées, or one looked on the menu of a restaurant and saw a list of entrées, it was interesting to remember that there was a close connection between the two. This banquet-ballet was the forerunner of the Masque, which in itself was virtually the foundation of modern ballet. Under Louis XIV., dancing, music, and scenic effect all took on new life, but the art of mime had yet to come. It came at the dawn of the 18th century, when the Duchess du Maine made an attempt to revive the old Roman art of pantomime, and organized at her own château the performance of a scene from a play by Corneille. This really proved a turning-point in the history of ballet, which henceforth as a distinct and separate art continued to develop throughout the 18th century. After reviewing the chief points in the history of ballet during that period, Mr. Perugini went on to say that about 1830 Carlo Blassis set about reforming the conventions and establishing the technique of choreographical composition on which practically the whole of modern ballet had since been based. Following on his work, came the second great period, that of the 'forties, when, largely under the patronage of the young Queen Victoria, ballet became as much the rage in London as the opera. The names of the Ellsers, of Carlotta Grisi, of Grahn, of Cerrito, and, above all, of Taglioni, were known to all to-day in connection with that period. From the 'fifties the ballet declined, but in the 'eighties a new and great revival came with the opening of the Alhambra and the Empire. At the former was produced a remarkable series of ballets of all kinds, including 'Victoria and Merry England,' with music by Sullivan. The history of the Empire was equally brilliant. For twenty-four years at both houses ballet was the chief and continuous attraction—with foreign stars, certainly, but with English dancers for the bulk of the cast, and without State-aid. The music for these productions was almost entirely the work of British musicians. The Russian Ballet was too fresh in the minds of all to need more than mention. Considered as a distinct and composite art of the theatre it was as near perfection as could be. It ought to be perfectly possible to produce ballet in this country that should be the work of British artists. It would be only a matter of organization, of co-operation, and of time. The English dancer had every point in her favour, we had authors who could supply the stories, scenic artists and costume designers who could supply the décor, and a number of musicians with the dramatic feeling necessary to compose ballet-music. We knew what music could express when working on dramatic material as in, for example, 'L'Enfant Prodigue' and 'Coppelia.' Ballet was simply a clearly-defined form of drama in which the story was told without words. Whether it was worthy of a musician's co-operation was a matter of personal inclination. If we were not so extraordinarily diffident in this country about our artistic achievements, as compared with the harder-working and more confident foreigner, we should probably long ago have had ballet established, along with opera and a National Theatre, as a permanent and State-aided institution.

GLASTONBURY FESTIVAL SCHOOL

A Festival of old English music and drama is to be held by this School during the Easter vacation. The programme of performances is as follows:

March 28 ...	Elizabethan Music.
April 3 ...	Morality Play, 'Everyman.'
April 4 ...	Music of Purcell.
April 5 ...	Old English Music and Dances.
April 6 and 7 ...	Masque, 'Venus and Adonis' (John Blow). Repetitions.

The instruction to be given at the School comprises a special course in old English dances (under the direction of Miss Nellie Chaplin); early English chamber music; and madrigals and early English choral music.

The syllabus can be obtained from Miss Edith Percy, 86, High Street, Glastonbury.

Music in the Provinces

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS)

BELFAST

On February 6 the Philharmonic Society gave its third Subscription Concert, when a programme was presented which was much enjoyed by an overflowing audience. The president of the Society, the Earl of Shaftesbury, had been announced to take part in the performance, but to the great regret of the Society and of the public was prevented by indisposition. His place was taken by Mr. John Adams, whose singing was worthy of his high reputation. Instrumental music of the highest order was contributed by Mr. William Murdoch and Mr. Lionel Tertis, who played César Franck's Sonata in A minor together, and each was heard in a number of smaller pieces. The quality of the performance of these celebrated artists is beyond criticism. The Society's conductor, Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, directed good interpretations of Stanford's 'Phaëdra Crohoore' and Sir Hubert Parry's 'The Chivalry of the Sea' for chorus and orchestra, and, for orchestra alone, the Overture to Wagner's 'Tristan and Isolde' and Sullivan's 'Di Ballo' Overture.

The Belfast Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, gave another excellent concert on February 14. The solo artists were Miss Winifred Burnett, violin, Mr. John Mundy (Dublin), violoncello, and Mr. R. M. Kent, vocalist. The programme included, for the orchestra, the Overture to 'Shamus O'Brien' (Stanford), Adagio from the 'Prometheus' ballet music (Beethoven), Symphony No. 1 (Beethoven), 'Siegfried Idyll' (Wagner), 'Rustic Revel' (Percy E. Fletcher), Barcarolle from 'Tales of Hoffmann' (Offenbach), 'Bee's Wedding' (Mendelssohn), and the Overture, 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (Nicolai). Miss Burnett was heard in the 'Rondo Capriccio,' Op. 25 (Saint-Saëns), and Mr. Mundy also played solos.

BIRMINGHAM

Owing to the daily increasing number of concerts at Birmingham it will be necessary to deal with each event in less detail than normal times would permit.

The performance of 'Messiah' given by the Birmingham Choral Society on January 17, under Mr. Richard Wassell's able direction, was one that strongly appealed to Handel worshippers of the orthodox school, being inspired by the feeling of religious conviction rather than a desire for sensational and startling effects. The solo artists were Miss Margaret Harrison, Miss Gladys Griffith, Mr. Arthur Gilbert, and Mr. Arthur Cranmer.

Mr. Appleby Matthews's choir and orchestra occupied the Town Hall on January 20, and again gave a telling and completely successful performance of Haydn's 'Creation,' a work that, after a hundred and twenty-eight years, still attracts appreciative audiences, for its descriptive character and wealth of melodious themes remain a source of undoubted pleasure. Mr. Matthews's reading revealed the intrinsic beauties of the music, and excellent work was done by chorus and orchestra, and by the principal artists (Miss Dorothy Silk, Dr. Tom Goodey, and Mr. William Hayle).

For the moment Mr. Matthews is the busiest musician in Birmingham, the latest appointment bestowed upon him—by the executive committee of the City of Birmingham Orchestra—being that of conductor of the Birmingham Orchestra for the ensuing year, with the proviso that Mr. Richard Wassell shall be appointed to conduct eight concerts during the season. Mr. Matthews already holds the position of conductor of the successful Sunday Evening Orchestral Concerts at the Futurist Theatre, and is also conductor and trainer of the Birmingham Police Band, as well as of his fine Choral Society. He has a broad policy in view for the New City Birmingham Orchestra, and intends to recruit and organize a band of the highest class, and to make its influence felt throughout the Midlands.

Elgar's ever-welcome 'King Olaf' was given by the Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association at the Town Hall on January 31. Mr. Joseph H. Adams obtained some excellent results from the choir and orchestra, while creditable work was done by the soloists—Madame Parkes-Derby, Mr. Walter Ottey, and Mr. Harry Horner.

One of the best orchestral concerts that Mr. Appleby Matthews has yet given at the Futurist Theatre was on Sunday, February 1, when the programme comprised Sibelius's 'Finlandia,' Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem, 'Les Préludes,' and the 'Tannhäuser' Overture. The orchestra is now fully and richly-equipped, and the players are in perfect sympathy with the conductor's beat, the results obtained being extremely gratifying. A new tenor, Mr. Bernard Sims, contributed Wagner's 'Narration' from 'Lohengrin,' and the Prize Song from the 'Mastersingers.'

The Festival Choral Society, at its concert in the Town Hall on February 4, gave for the second time Dr. William H. Harris's fantasy for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, entitled 'The Hound of Heaven,' set to Francis Thompson's poem. The favourable impression created at its first hearing twelve months ago was even more emphasised at its second hearing. Mr. Allen K. Blackall again conducted a vivid and absorbing performance. Choir and orchestra were on their mettle, fully realising the deep-felt character of the music, and in the trying baritone solo part Capt. Horace Stevens achieved complete success. Sir Henry Wood conducted all the other works in the programme, namely, Stanford's 'Revenge,' Vaughan Williams's Overture, 'The Wasps,' and Baron D'Erlanger's 'Sursum Corda.' Miss Dorothy Howell's symphonic poem, 'Lamia,' had to be omitted, owing to the fact that Sir Henry had not been able to devote sufficient time for rehearsal. The magnificent playing of Grieg's Pianoforte concerto by M. Arthur de Greef created a furore.

The fourth and last Quinlan Subscription Concert at the Town Hall on February 5 proved the greatest success of the season, and with good reason. With Mr. Albert Coates in charge of the Beecham Symphony Orchestra, Brahms's C minor Symphony was given with all the nobility of expression and vitality in rhythm and phrasing that go to make a great performance. The conductor also secured wonderfully impressive readings of Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite, 'The Tale of Tsar Saltan' and Stravinsky's 'L'Oiseau de Feu.' Madame Renée Chemet's fine interpretation of Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole' was on the same high level of excellence.

Mr. Richard Wassell, at his popular orchestral concert at the Town Hall on February 7, gave strong proof of undoubted gifts as an orchestral conductor. The sterling qualities of sound musicianship were revealed in his intimate reading of Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, and in his control of the orchestra in Max Bruch's Violin Concerto in G minor. The soloist in the Concerto was M. Zacharewitsch, who is a great favourite in the Midlands. The Choral Union choir was also heard in some of Granville Bantock's part-songs. The novelty of the evening was an Orchestral Suite of three tone-pictures by Miss D. M. Brookes.

The combined recital of Miss Winifred Brown (pianoforte) and Miss Tessie Thomas (violin) at the Royal Society of Artists' Gallery on January 21 was excellent in matter and in manner of performance. The artists were heard together in Elgar's Sonata—now a popular work at Birmingham—and in the Sonata of Delius, and each was responsible for a group of modern British pieces. On the following day some admirable quartet playing was provided by Mr. Percival Hodgson, Mr. Charles W. Bly, Mr. Paul Beard, and Miss Joan Willis, the programme including the Debussy Quartet, Beethoven's Op. 18, No. 2, in G major, and the favourite 'Lady Audrey's Suite' of Herbert Howells. There was some spirited and facile playing in the last-mentioned work. Mr. Max Mossel's third popular concert at Central Hall on January 28 took the form of a recital by Miss Dorothea Webb, an artistic vocalist, and Mr. Frederic Lamond, who has long been a stranger to Birmingham. His noble interpretation of the 'Appassionata' showed what the City has missed in the meantime. The chief attraction offered by Madame Minadieu's third Matinée Musicale on February 7 was the singing of Mr. Plunket Greene. In his choice of songs and in their interpretation this fine artist revealed all the discrimination and characteristic individuality that have built up his well-deserved reputation. The programme also gained interest from the inclusion of Brahms's Trio in A minor for pianoforte, clarinet, and violinello (finely played by Mr. Harold Craxton, Mr. Charles Draper, and Miss Joan Willis), and a clever and original 'Comedy Suite' for clarinet and pianoforte by Herbert Howells.

It remains to mention Mr. Hubert S. Brown's ballad concert at the Midland Institute on January 24, the 'International Celebrity' Concert at the Town Hall on January 27 (with Madame Clara Butt as an irresistible central attraction), and the concert given at the Town Hall on Sunday, February 8, in aid of the National Institution for the Blind, which, regrettably, was not well patronised.

BOURNEMOUTH

The present series of Bournemouth Symphony Concerts has now run about half its course, and this circumstance affords us an opportunity for taking stock of the Orchestra's achievements as they appear to us after some four months' sustained effort.

First, then, it may safely be asserted that the standard of performance under Mr. Dan Godfrey's splendid direction has, during this first half of the season, shown an all-round efficiency that the Orchestra has never hitherto approached, revealing at once a refinement and an intensity surpassing even our pre-war experiences. We do not recall a time when the ensemble attained so consummate a fusion in blending.

Then, again, we must thank Mr. Godfrey for so frequently stepping aside from the beaten track when compiling his programmes. Within the last few weeks especially has he revived works that cannot be heard elsewhere in this country, although we feel sure that performances of them in other quarters would meet with as ready acceptance as awaited them at Bournemouth. On the other hand, of course, there are certain compositions unknown to Bournemouth which we would like to hear and (we may safely assume) Mr. Godfrey to play. Their inaccessibility is however due to the limitations imposed upon the Municipal Orchestra by reason of its numerical strength, which is insufficient for the production of works that require more instruments than go to the make up of the so-called 'ordinary' orchestra. Scriabin's 'Divine Poem' may be instanced, and there are many other works that are similarly barred to us. This, then, is the one outstanding defect of the Bournemouth Orchestra, and unhappily it is an impediment that is not likely to be removed in the near future. In short, Mr. Godfrey cannot achieve the impossible, although at times it may have seemed that he has effected even this. But he does at least bring to performance a number of compositions that other orchestras have hardly heard of. We regard this as a very commendable policy, for, with all deference to the standard works of Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Schubert, and Tchaikovsky, the repetition of music that has reached the stage of popular familiarity can be over-much insisted upon.

On February 5, for example, a revival was given of the 'Romeo and Juliet' Symphony by Berlioz. No one would describe this as an epoch-making work, although such a description might not be far from the truth; but its utter neglect, practically speaking, does not reflect much credit upon the enterprise of orchestral directors. Even though shorn of its choral embellishments, it remains a work of considerable attractiveness, and is surely worth hearing for its instrumentation alone. The 'Queen Mab' Scherzo was brilliantly played on this occasion, and those who are acquainted with its difficulties will need no other description of the efficiency of the players than is afforded in the above characterization.

Other interesting revivals were the 'Husitska' Overture by Dvorák and Ravel's 'Mother Goose' Suite, neither of which had found inclusion in a programme here for some years. Among the better-known compositions whose attractions are presented with greater regularity, and which should not be omitted from this record, were the following: the first Symphony of Brahms, Beethoven's ninth Symphony (minus the choral section), John Ireland's Prelude 'The Forgotten Rite,' and Dukas's 'Polyeucte' Overture.

The 'Three Pieces' by Lord Berners formed the only novelty of the month. They are admittedly satires, and, in our opinion, rather ill-natured ones. Lord Berners seeks to evoke our laughter—and succeeds. But all the time we cannot resist the feeling that to laugh at the subjects which he is caricaturing is not a very gracious occupation.

The soloists have been Miss Winifred Browne, who was unable to reconcile us to the inanities of Tchaikovsky's Andante and Finale for Pianoforte and Orchestra; Miss Murray Lambert, who displayed considerable musicianship and tasteful feeling in Dvorák's Violin Concerto; Miss Chilton Griffin, whose reading of Rachmaninov's fine Pianoforte Concerto in C minor was of masculine vigour, but whose tempi were occasionally not sufficiently spirited; and, lastly, on February 5, Mr. Ernest Whitfield, who acted as substitute for M. Louis Godowsky, who, owing to illness, had to relinquish his engagement. Mr. Whitfield, however, played the work which the original soloist had elected to perform—the Beethoven Violin Concerto—and displayed considerable ability.

BRADFORD, ETC.

The Bradford Subscription Concert on February 6 was devoted to Chamber music, which always seems somewhat lost in the great area of St. George's Hall. For this reason, no doubt, the committee had secured two string quartet parties, Miss Beatrice Harrison's and Mr. Frederick Holding's (the 'Philharmonic'), who joined in playing two works of exceptional beauty, and both the products of their authors' early and freshest period. Mendelssohn's Octet is, as the production of a lad in his sixteenth year, a miracle which is without a parallel, and Brahms's Sextet in B flat, though not in the same sense phenomenal, belongs to the time of his artistic youth. Both numbers were artistically played, though one felt that the executants could have got into closer touch with each other, and with their audience, in a smaller concert-room. There were two vocalists—one too many for the proportions of the programme—Madame Kirkby Lunn and Mr. Fraser Gange.

Free Chamber Concerts have taken place on January 19 and February 2. On the former occasion Violin Sonatas by Medtner and Elgar were played by Miss Mabel Priestley and Mr. Midgley, and Mr. Charlesworth was the vocalist: on the latter date Dohnányi's String Trio—a rather dull work—and Pianoforte Quartets by Mackenzie (an early composition, not very characteristic) and Hurlstone (the powerful and interesting Quartet in E minor) were played by Messrs. Midgley, Edgar Drake, Thornton, and G. S. Drake. The vocalist was Miss Annie Cockcroft. The Edgar Drake String Quartet gave a second concert on January 23, and played Quartets by Beethoven (in G, Op. 18, No. 2) and Glière (in A, Op. 2); also a very pleasing Trio by Arne for two violins and pianoforte (Mr. George Smith) with an ad lib. and almost superfluous part for violinello. Mr. Harry Horner sang some well-chosen songs in thoroughly artistic fashion.

On February 5 Mr. Charles Stott gave his monthly organ recital at All Saints' Church, introducing Handel's eighth concerto and Karg-Elert's Sonatina in A minor, both pieces being well suited to the genius of the instrument. Miss Kathleen Moorhouse, an artistic young violincellist, played Max Bruch's 'Kol Nidrei' and an Andante by Popper in finished style.

Huddersfield was visited by Madame Clara Butt on February 2, and on February 7 Mr. A. W. Kaye's orchestra, the strings of which are largely recruited from his pupils, was heard in Beethoven's fifth Symphony, Smetana's 'Bartered Bride' Overture, and Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody, the last going with commendable verve. Miss Lucy Nuttall and Mr. Horace Binks were the vocalists.

At the concert of the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society on February 10, Mr. C. H. Moody conducted part-songs by, among others, MacDowell and Rutland Boughton. Miss Rosina Buckman was the vocalist, and Mr. Felix Salmon played violinello solos in masterly fashion.—The recital of the Huddersfield Music Club, on February 11, was by Mr. and Mrs. York Bowen, who introduced a number of interesting compositions by Mr. York Bowen and other native musicians, songs and pianoforte pieces.—On January 30 the York Musical Society made a new departure in giving a chamber concert at which the Catterall Quartet appeared, and was heard in quartets by Mozart, Borodin (in D), and Elgar. The idea is an excellent one, and should enlarge the scope and improve the taste of the members, who assembled in great force.—The Hull Subscription Concerts, organized by Mr. Janssen, came to a close on January 31, when Mr. Maaskoff played Bach's first Violin Concerto; and Mr. Herbert Fryer gave a musicianly interpretation of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 110). Miss Vera Horton was the vocalist.

BRISTOL

The contrast between the old and new periods of vocal writing was illustrated in the programme of the Bristol Madrigal Society's concert, which drew a large audience to the Victoria Rooms on January 21. Over eighty voices, including a number of Bristol Grammar School boys, sang together under Mr. Hubert Hunt's guidance in selections from Orlando Gibbons, Weelkes, and Wilbye, in the older school; and of Pearsall, Dr. Cyril Rootham (an old Bristolian), Dr. Basil Harwood (president of the Society), Mr. P. Napier Miles, of Kingsweston, and Sir Charles Stanford, in the modern school.

Mr. Arnold Baxter, the indefatigable conductor of the New Philharmonic Society, put on a very ambitious programme at Colston Hall, before a good audience, on January 28. He perhaps overestimated the powers of his orchestra, which is assembled for the occasion of these concerts and can have little combined rehearsal. The fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky was not the best selection he could have made to show the prowess of his players. But in Berlioz's 'Carnaval Romain,' Butterworth's 'A Shropshire Lad,' Herbert Howells's 'Puck's Minuet,' and Percy Grainger's 'Morris Dance,' the interpretations were very delightful, creditable alike to conductor and performers. M. Arthur de Greef played a number of Chopin pieces and Grieg's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, with individuality and temperament, and always artistically. The choir had only a minor place, Elgar's 'Weary Wind of the West' being very pleasantly sung.

Miss Marion Pope gave an excellent dramatic recital on January 30 for her début at Victoria Rooms, when she was assisted by Miss Evelyn Pullen (violinello), Mr. Lionel Doré (vocalist), and Miss Kitty Newton (pianoforte).

M. Jacques-Dalcroze gave his interesting lecture on 'Eurhythmics' at Victoria Rooms on January 31, with the help of several of his students from Geneva and London. It was an educational demonstration of musical development by movement that was witnessed with pleasure and profit.

After a lapse of several seasons, the Cecilia Choral Society—composed of staff members of the great works of Messrs. J. S. Fry & Sons—sang Schubert's 'Song of Miriam' for their first concert on January 31 at Colston Hall. The choir of a hundred and thirty voices and a moderate-sized orchestra gave a very good account of themselves under Mr. Charles Read's conducting, and showed appreciation, that will improve still more with practice, of the nuances of the work. Miss May Hulbert sang the soprano solos. Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah' and Stanford's 'Last Post' were other items which gave much pleasure. The band played Luigini's 'Egyptian Ballet' Suite, Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet,' and three movements of the 'Symphony Pathétique.' The first two numbers were intelligently performed, but the orchestra was by no means complete enough in numbers or combination to give adequate interpretation of the symphonic excerpts. This Society is, however, doing a most useful work locally.

Here we come to the bonne bouche of the Bristol concert season, viz., the visit of the Beecham Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Albert Coates, on February 3, at Colston Hall. Musicians do not require to be told of the excellency of this celebrated combination, nor to be reminded of the powers of Mr. Coates. The orchestra played a Rimsky-Korsakov Suite, the 'Parsifal' Good Friday music, the 'Figaro' Overture, and the 'Symphony Pathétique' of Tchaikovsky magnificently. The last-named was a revelation to the Bristol public of the potentialities of orchestral music.

Madame Edna Thornton and Mr. Peter Dawson, who got an ovation for 'Largo al Factotum' (Rossini) were the vocalists. The occasion was the last of four Quinlan concerts, and so well is the promoter satisfied that he is giving a series of five concerts next season.

The Bristol Choral Society, under Mr. George Riseley's vigorous and sure guidance, again gave a splendid performance of Parker's 'Hora Novissima' (by request) at their concert on February 7, before a fine attendance at Colston Hall. The Society wants more tenors, and more vitality among the male voices at times. Cohesion and precision are, however, always assured, and the female voices are excellent. Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Joseph Reed, Miss Gertrude Higgs, and Mr. Charles Knowles were the soloists, and there was a small efficient orchestra led by Mr. Philip Lewis. Parts 2 and 3 of 'Hiawatha' comprised the second half of the programme, the performance being marked by much taste and feeling on the part of the choir, which seemed to find inspiration in the imaginative score. The band fully shared in the success of a performance that was creditable to all concerned.

Bristol Amateur Operatic Society gave its first performance after the war, on February 11, at Victoria Rooms, and achieved a veritable triumph. Under Mr. Bruce Bedells, a splendid representation by principals, chorus, and orchestra of German's delightful comic opera 'Tom Jones' received the warmest applause from large houses during the run of four nights.

On February 12, Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society gave a very charming ladies' night concert at Colston Hall under Mr. Riseley, their veteran trainer, when they sang such attractive music as Moore's 'Oft in the still night,' Baynes's 'Dream, baby, dream,' Beethoven's 'Hymn to night,' 'The land of the leal,' and 'Bonnie Doon,' with all the finish and sweetness for which this Society has been so widely known since its initiation by ten members, under Mr. T. H. Crook, nearly seventy-six years ago. Rhodes's 'Glow-worm,' C. Lee Williams's 'Angling rhymes,' a neat and lilting musical 'jest,' and S. W. Underwood's 'Blow, blow, thou winter wind,' a poetic setting of Shakespeare, were the novelties, conducted in the case of the last two by their respective composers. Mr. John Collett and Mr. Donald Reid were the vocalists.

The Bristol postmen's annual charity concert, on February 13, at Victoria Rooms, attracted as usual a large and sympathetic audience. Miss Minnie Searle, Miss Marion Elles, Mr. Frank Webster (the young tenor of the D'Oyly Carte Company, who is a Bristol Eisteddfod medallist), and Mr. Joseph Farrington contributed to a pleasant miscellaneous programme. Mr. Clifford Hellier, Mr. Algernon Salter, and Mr. W. E. Fowler were the violin, violinello, and pianoforte performers respectively.

A sacred cantata, 'The Light of Life,' formed the first part of the programme given by the Bristol Welsh Choral Society at the Y.M.C.A. Large Hall on February 4. A choir of about fifty voices sang under the direction of Mr. Harry Jones, and the accompaniment was provided by Mr. W. E. Fowler.

Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson gave a lecture on 'Hymn Tunes,' under the auspices of the Church Music Society, at Victoria Rooms on January 27. The lecture was illustrated with hymns sung by a choir that included choristers of All Saints' (Clifton), St. Mary's (Tyndall's Park), St. Mary Redcliff, and St. Nicholas Churches, the organ accompaniment being played by Mr. C. W. Stear. The chair was taken by Dr. Basil Harwood.

Gaul's 'The Holy City' was given by Highbridge Choral Society on January 29, with Mr. Victor Dyer as conductor and Miss Lilian Channon as organist.

CORNWALL.

Goldsithney Choir has gained a high reputation for singing in the district, and now numbers thirty voices. On January 7 they sang selections from Handel's oratorios, conducted by Miss F. J. Williams, and assisted by a small orchestra.

After a silence of over three years Mabe Male Choir gave a concert on January 16, conducted by the Rev. C. D. Atkinson. The choruses sung included 'Hallelujah,'

'A wet sheet and a flowing sea,' 'In this hour of softened splendour,' 'Rockaway,' 'The beleaguered,' and 'O peaceful night.'

At a singing contest held at Stenalees on January 26 the adjudicator was Mr. C. G. Luscombe. St. Austell mixed-voice quartet gained the first place in that particular class, and St. Austell male-voice quartet the second.

Camborne Orpheus Choir on January 29 sang at an organ recital given at Tuckingmill by Mr. L. J. Ursell.

COVENTRY AND DISTRICT

There has been another month of musical activity. Considerable interest was centred in the first appearance at Coventry of Mr. John Coates, the well-known tenor, who visited the Opera House on Sunday, January 18. He sang ballads which ranged from an old Elizabethan air by Thomas Williams to Vaughan Williams's modern song of Dorset, 'Linden Lea.' At the same concert, Miss Winifred Taylor gave a fine interpretation at the pianoforte of the Liszt Sonata in B minor. The second vocalist was Miss Vera Horton, whose contributions were mainly songs of the modern school.

The Coventry Chamber Music Society gave its second concert of the season in St. Mary's Hall on January 22. Miss Gertrude Fuller (violin) and Miss Rosemary Savage (pianoforte) played a Trio in D minor by Joseph Gibbs, an 18th century composer who is little known, and also the Elgar Sonata in E minor (Op. 82) and Sonata in G major (Beethoven). The vocalist was Mr. Herbert Simmonds, who sang Moussorgsky's Serenade ('Dance of Death') and compositions by Tchaikovsky, Brahms, and Debussy.

On January 25 Dr. Tom Goodey and Miss Elsie Gough (vocalists), and Mr. Michael Mullinar (pianoforte) appeared at the Opera House Sunday concerts.

The following Sunday, February 1, the local Armstrong-Siddeley Orchestra, under the baton of Mr. Mathew Stevenson, occupied the platform. The programme included the 'Siegfried Idyll' (Wagner), 'Merry Wives of Windsor' Overture (Nicolai), the Overture and March 'Prince Igor' (Borodin), and 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance' (Balfour Gardiner). In the absence of Miss Desirée Ellinger, through illness, the vocalists were Miss Mary Foster, who sang 'O Don Fatale' (Verdi), 'The Lament of Isis' (Bantock), and other items, and Mr. John Lunn, whose contributions included the Cavatina 'Even bravest heart,' from Gounod's 'Faust.' The excellence of the orchestral section of the programme reflected credit upon the performers, many of whom were local players.

On February 5 the Coventry Musical Club Male-Voice Choir gave its annual concert in the Baths Assembly Hall. The programme included 'Bold Turpin' (Bridge), 'Feasting, I watch' (Elgar), and 'Boot and Saddle' (Bantock).

Miss Lena Kontorovitch, the Russian violinist, re-appeared at the Opera House on Sunday, February 8, and received support from Mr. Harold Williams, the Australian baritone, and Miss Winifred Taylor.

The coming month promises much that is of musical interest at Coventry.

At Leamington, two of the six special concerts arranged by the Corporation music committee, have taken place. On January 22 Miss Carrie Tubb appeared. Her songs included the aria 'Salce' from Verdi's 'Otello.' At the same concert, Miss Ethel Varrick (violin) collaborated with Miss Frances Coupman (pianoforte) in a masterly interpretation of the second and third movements of the Grieg Sonata arranged for violin and pianoforte. On February 5 M. Arthur de Greef, the Belgian pianist, gave a pianoforte recital in the Town Hall.

DARLINGTON AND DISTRICT

The Darlington Choral and Orchestral Society gave its first concert since the beginning of the war, at the Baptist Tabernacle, on February 2. Like so many other towns in the North, all the available halls are monopolised by picture shows, and but for the generosity of the Trustees in placing this comfortable and commodious building at the Society's disposal, it would have been compelled to abandon its activities. The choir is naturally smaller than formerly, and contains a large percentage of young and inexperienced singers. In spite of these drawbacks, and the fact that they were in unfamiliar surroundings, they gave a good account of themselves, and furnished abundant promise of future excellence. The choral works were Stanford's 'The Revenge,' and Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George,' the latter particularly being given with great spirit and promptness of attack. Miss Dorothy Silk was the soloist, and in addition to her part in Elgar's cantata, she gave very fine performances of an 'Ave Maria' by Max Bruch, and Bantock's 'By the Ganges' and 'The Lament of Isis' with orchestral accompaniment. A popular feature of the programme was the brilliant interpretation of Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto by Mr. A. Minto. The concert began with Mozart's 'Don Giovanni' Overture. There was a crowded audience, many being unable to gain admission.

The Darlington Chamber Music Society gave its third concert on January 27, at Polam Hall. The Arthur Catterall Quartet supplied the programme, which comprised Mozart in E flat, Borodin in D, and two short movements, a beautiful arrangement of a Hebrew melody by Alfred Wall, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and Frank Bridge's 'Londonderry Air.' On January 29 the same players gave a chamber concert for the Middlesbrough Music Union in the Wesley Hall, with the assistance of Miss Taormina Meo, vocalist. The Quartets played were Beethoven, Op. 130, Phantasie Quartet, Ernest Walker, and Debussy in G minor. The English work met with a very cordial reception from the audience.

On February 11 the last of the Corbett Concerts was given in the Town Hall, Middlesbrough, by the Beecham Orchestra, directed by Mr. Albert Coates, and with Mr. Frank Mullings as vocalist. It speaks well for the development of musical taste in the district, that two out of the four concerts of the series—which in normal times were Ballad concerts—should have been devoted to orchestral performances, and that in both cases the huge hall was packed to overflowing. Beethoven's A major Symphony was given a really uplifting performance, and the infectious rhythm of the whole work never for a moment lost its irresistible impetus. Mr. Frank Mullings was in grand form, and took the house by storm with impassioned readings of the Prize Song from the 'Meistersingers,' and the Death Song from Verdi's 'Otello.'

A very interesting vocal recital was given in the New Miners' Hall, Durham, on February 11, by Madame Blanche Newcombe (Mrs. Edward Pace), assisted by Mr. J. P. Boden (solo pianoforte), Mr. J. N. Wright (violin), Mr. P. Steed (who sang Maori songs), Mr. C. M. Armitage (a male soprano), and Mrs. J. F. Hobson (accompanist). Madame Newcombe sings most artistically, and for her first group of songs gave 'Sognai' (Schira), 'L'invitation au voyage' (Duparc), 'Le Crépuscule' (Massenet), and 'Chant Hindoo' (Bemberg). For the second group Nos. 1, 3, 5, 6, and 10 from Arthur Somervell's 'Maud' cycle, were selected, and for the last group a selection of modern songs, including Martin Shaw's 'Bubble song.'

As an example of what a country village choral society can do when its energies are judiciously directed, the concert of the Sleights-near-Whitby Choral Society may be mentioned. The first half of the programme was devoted to Van Bree's 'St. Cecilia's Day,' with string and pianoforte accompaniment, and the second part included a movement from Schubert's B flat Trio (Op. 99), songs by Elgar and Landon Ronald, Goens's Scherzo for violin, and Popper's 'Arlequin' for cello; also part-songs by the Society. There was a crowded audience. At its next concert the Society is attacking Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George.'

The Eskdale (Whitby District) Tournament has resumed its work, and a competitive festival will be given in April this year.

DEVON

St. Peter's Quartet (Plymouth) has made its reappearance with much success and has been greatly in request locally. Torquay Borough Glee Singers, a quartet of male voices, have also reappeared and sang at a concert in the Town Hall on January 25, when the Pavilion Orchestra played, conducted by Mr. Francis Burton.

Selections from 'Messiah' were sung at Chelston (Torquay), on January 28, by the Wesleyan choir, conducted by Mr. E. W. Goss.

Iftracombe Choral Society, recently resuscitated, gave an excellent performance on January 27 of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast.' Band and choir, numbering seventy-five, were conducted by Mr. G. K. Batten, and the principal vocalist was Mr. Ward Kennedy, of Exeter Cathedral.

'Messiah' was given by Ottery St. Mary Choral Society on February 10, assisted by an orchestra led by Miss K. Martin. Mr. Stanley Chipperfield conducted, and the choral singing was careful and firm in attack. The principals were Madame Isabel Hickson (Exeter), Miss May Keene (Bristol), Mr. Royland Huyshe (Clyst Hydon), and the Rev. R. Spurrell (Roundon).

The band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry, Plymouth Division, played a week-end season of concerts at Torquay Pavilion from January 15 to 19, Mr. P. S. G. O'Donnell conducting. A symphony concert and a sacred concert were the prominent features.

Another welcome reappearance was that of Mr. Henry E. Crocker's String Orchestra, also in the Torquay Pavilion, on February 10. They played music by Grieg, Coleridge-Taylor, Ericks, and Pierné, Granville Bantock's 'Scenes from the Scottish Highlands,' a 'Larghetto elegiac,' by Tchaikovsky, and Percy Fletcher's 'Fiddle Dance'; also some folk-tunes. Mr. Crocker played violin music by Cottenet and Mlynarski, and Miss Fifine de la Côte sang operatic pieces and songs by Landon Ronald.

The second of Mr. Harold Rhodes's Chamber Concerts on February 11 was the occasion of a visit from Miss Phyllis Lett. Miss Maud Arnold played violoncello music by Strauss, Eccles, and Dittersdorf. Mr. Harold Rhodes at the pianoforte played pieces by Chopin.

At the second concert of the season given by Dr. Weekes's Orchestral Society at Plymouth on February 11, the overture was Landon Ronald's 'Birthday.' Beethoven's fifth Symphony was played, and a new tone-poem, 'Paphnutius,' by Harold Lake, was the novelty, the composer conducting. Miss Florence Woolland (violin) played with the orchestra Saint-Saëns's 'Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso.' Dr. Weekes and Mr. Walter Weekes shared the conducting.

Two chamber concerts have been given during the month. The first on January 28, at Exeter, was the occasion of a visit to her native city of Miss May Bartlett (violoncello), who brought with her Miss Marjorie Hayward (violin) and Miss Elsie Richards (pianoforte). The three artists gave an interesting reading of Saint-Saëns's Trio. Miss Bartlett, in addition to music by Fauré, Saint-Saëns, and Schubert, introduced two Fancies by May Mukle, 'Hamadryad' and 'Light wind,' both charmingly fresh and attractive, and entirely suited to the instrument. Miss Hayward's solos were two arrangements by Moffat ('Bourrée' and 'Admiral's Galliard'), Cottenet's 'Meditation,' and a Bohemian dance (Smetana-Ondricek). Mrs. Ernest Bullock showed that as a pianist she will be a valuable acquisition to the city. Her interpretations of César Franck's 'Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue,' of Rachmaninov's 'Elegie,' John Ireland's 'Chelsea Reach,' and Debussy's 'Toccata' were sincerely musicianly and thoroughly well carried out. She played also a short Prelude by Ernest Bullock, an expressive idea presented on modern lines.

The other important event was a pianoforte recital given at Bideford on February 6 by Miss Phyllis Huxham. This gifted pianist, still in her 'teens, has been studying at the Royal Academy, and made her début at Wigmore Hall in November last. She is a native of Bideford, and her appearance there attracted a very large audience. After a remarkably intimate interpretation of the Bach Chaconne as arranged by Busoni, she gave an expressive and clever reading of Liszt's Sonata—though we think this stupendous work demands more powerful technique than Miss Huxham yet has at her disposal. A Chopin group was delightfully played, particularly the C sharp minor Etude. Miss Bessie Kerr sang songs by Gretchaninov, Frank Bridge, and Coleridge-Taylor.

DUBLIN

On January 19, a very fine recital of chamber music was given at the theatre of the Royal Dublin Society by Dr. Esposito, Dr. Brodsky, Mr. Simon Speelman, and Mr. Walter Hatton. In particular, Mozart's Trio in E flat and Brahms's Quartet in G minor afforded very great satisfaction.

M. Jaques-Dalcroze gave a demonstration of his system of Eurhythmics at the Theatre Royal on the afternoon of January 19, the exercises being most gracefully performed by four brilliant graduates of the Dalcroze Institute at Geneva. The audience was most appreciative, both the lecturer and his capable assistants evoking unstinted applause.

Dr. Grattan Flood gave an interesting lecture at the Town Hall, Wexford, on January 20, on 'Modern Irish Composers.' The illustrations were mainly by Miss Teresa Owens, a Dublin soprano of exceptional ability, and by Mr. Arthur S. Meates, principal tenor of the Flintoff-Moore Opera Company. Miss Owens and Mr. Meates were repeatedly encored, especially in the selections from Balfe, Wallace, Sullivan, Hamilton Harty, and Stanford.

Two very agreeable performances of Wallace's opera, 'Maritana,' were given by the Dundee Choral Society at the Town Hall, Dundalk, on January 22 and 23, under the conductorship of Mr. J. B. Van Craen. This Society won first prize at the Feis Ceoil in 1916, 1917, and 1918, and its presentation of 'Maritana' was most creditable, reflecting the utmost distinction on the popular and energetic conductor.

The Flintoff-Moore Opera Company has had a very successful provincial tour in Leinster and Munster, attracting large audiences at Waterford, Limerick, Wexford, Enniscorthy, and other towns. Mr. Cuthbert Hawley proved an alert and resourceful conductor. Of the principals Mr. Flintoff-Moore, Mr. Meates, Miss Bower, Miss Moon, Miss Morris, Miss Fitzgerald, and Mr. O'Connor won instant success, while the chorus, orchestra, and staging were all that could be desired.

On January 20, Mr. Samuel Levenston, conductor of the orchestra of the Queen's Theatre, was presented with a handsome music case and an illuminated address by the members of the band, as a testimony of the players' appreciation of his abilities and courtesy. His brother Philip had been conductor for twenty-six years, a fact which was recalled in a felicitous speech by Mr. W. Byrne.

A pianoforte and violin recital was given at the theatre of the Royal Dublin Society on January 26, by Dr. Esposito and Signor Simonetti. The programme was attractively varied, and included items by Geminiani, Beethoven, and César Franck. The last mentioned was delightfully played.

Miss Jean Nolan gave an interesting song recital at the Aberdeen Hall on January 28. Her repertoire included songs by Debussy, Stanford, Hahn, Fauré, Hughes, Gretchaninov, and also a new song 'An Ardglass Roat Song,' by Dr. J. F. Larchet. Mr. John Mundy, cellist (with Mrs. Larchet as accompanist), and Dr. Larchet at the pianoforte, contributed greatly to the success of a very enjoyable entertainment by a most promising young Dublin vocalist, who was accorded a rapturous reception.

Mr. John Power has recently vacated the post of organist of SS. Peter and Paul, Clonmel, which he held for the past fifty years. He was not, however the doyen of Irish organists: that honour rests with Mr. Brendan Rogers, organist of the Pro-Cathedral, Dublin, whose professional career goes back to 1867.

Quite an interesting programme was presented by Sir Valentine Grace at the Aberdeen Hall on January 28, when Madame Borel, Mr. Raymond Browne Leckey, Mr. Patrick Delaney, and Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald gave some acceptable items.

At a recent meeting of the Governors of the Royal Irish Academy of Music, the plans were approved of a new concert hall, which will be a valuable addition to that institution.

The syllabus of the twenty-fourth Feis Ceoil has been issued, and the adjudicators include Dr. R. R. Terry, Dr. Esposito, Mr. Gregory Hast, Mr. A. W. Catterall, Mr. Marmaduke Barton, Mr. J. Ord Hume, and Mr. Arthur Darley.

Mr. T. H. Weaving, organist of the Castle Chapel (generally known as the Chapel Royal), has been appointed professor of singing in the Dublin Training College, under the Board of National Education, in succession to Dr. J. F. Larchet, who has resigned owing to his many professional engagements.

The Catterall String Quartet at the Royal Dublin Society's Theatre on February 2, gave one of the most enjoyable recitals of the season. Dr. Ernest Walker's Fantasia was much appreciated, as were also the items by Schumann and Josef Holbrooke.

Dubliners were delighted to have the opportunity of hearing the famous tenor Tom Burke on February 7, at the Theatre Royal. Other brilliant artists taking part in the well arranged programme were Miss Joan Ashley, Mr. Godfrey Ludlow, and Mr. Frank St. Leger, the last-named described in the announcements as 'the wonderful pianist.' Mr. Tom Burke shone especially in his Irish Ballads.

The O'Mara Opera Company opened a season at the Gaiety Theatre on February 9 with 'La Bohème,' followed by 'Samson and Delilah,' 'Madame Butterfly,' and other favourite works, including 'Tannhäuser.'

On February 9, Miss Annie Lord gave a pianoforte recital at the Royal Dublin Society's Theatre, and performed with considerable clan selections by César Franck, Debussy, and Moussorgsky, all from memory. She was at her best in Debussy.

What promises to be the event of the season in Dublin musical circles is the visit of the celebrated Beecham Orchestra, which is announced for the afternoon of February 17, at the Theatre Royal. Mr. Albert Coates will conduct, and Miss Edna Thornton is to be the vocalist.

EDINBURGH

Perhaps the most important musical event of the month was the Beethoven chamber music Festival arranged by Mr. J. Simpson. The complete series of Beethoven's Quartets were performed in chronological order by the London String Quartet from January 20 to 24, six concerts in all. Comment on the excellence of these music-makings is unnecessary. Large audiences attended each performance, and chamber music has received a splendid filip from the visit of this artistic combination of performers.

Paterson's Orchestral Concerts are improving steadily, both as regards the attraction they offer to audiences and in standard of performance. Mr. Landon Ronald is unifying the band in a remarkable manner, the pre-war standard of playing being rapidly regained.

On January 19 Madame Renée Chemet was solo violinist in Saint-Saëns's Concerto. Owing to the indisposition of Mr. Ronald, Mr. David Stephen, of Dunfermline, was called upon at very short notice to undertake the duties of conductor. It was no light task to conduct the Saint-Saëns number, but we congratulate our fellow-countryman on the general excellence of the whole orchestral programme, which was carried through in its entirety.

On January 26 we were introduced to Sir Edward Elgar's 'Falstaff,' a work we hope to hear again. The programme included two Nocturnes, (a) 'Images' and (b) 'Fêtes,' by Debussy, and Svendsen's 'Carnival in Paris.' Mr. Gervase Elwes gave an impressive reading of Frank Bridge's 'Blow out, you bugles.' He also contributed a series of old English songs, including 'The Self-banished,' by Blow, and 'Listen to the voice of love.'

The Reid Orchestral Concert on January 31 was as refreshing as the previous concerts of the series. Miss D'Aranyi played Joachim's Variations for violin and orchestra, and among the orchestral numbers were Tcherepnin's Prelude to 'La Princesse Loentaine,' Weber's Overture 'The Ruler of the Spirits,' and Schumann's fourth Symphony.

An enjoyable song recital was given on January 31 by Mr. Johnstone Douglas.

M. Jaques-Dalcroze gave a lecture demonstration on January 28 to an enthusiastic audience.

On February 2 Madame Helen Hopekirk appeared as pianist and composer in her Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. She received an ovation for her exceedingly melodious and characteristic Scotch composition. A wonderful performance of Mozart's G minor Symphony led to Mr. Landon Ronald receiving a triple recall for his artistic interpretation of this great classic.

On February 9 Elgar's second Symphony in E flat was the novelty of the evening. Wallace's 'Villon' Symphonic poem should be heard more frequently, and would soon become a popular number. M. Vladimir Rosing was the vocalist. His songs, 'Hindu,' by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and 'Field-Marshal Death,' by Moussorgsky, were the most interesting numbers introduced by him, and enhanced the reputation he had made at his chamber concert last month.

Mr. Albert Coates made his bow to an Edinburgh audience for the first time as conductor of the Beecham Symphony Orchestra on February 12. It is almost superfluous to say that Edinburgh echoes all the praise that has been given to this extraordinary personality. The programme included Brahms's first Symphony, Stravinsky's 'L'Oiseau de Feu' Suite, and two movements from Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Tale of Tsar Saltan.' Madame Renée Chemet played more brilliantly than ever in Lalo's 'Espagnole.' Mr. Peter Dawson was the vocalist.

GLASGOW

Madame Renée Chemet's appearance at the ninth Classical Concert drew a very large audience, and her playing of Saint-Saëns's Violin Concerto No. 3, in B minor, and some short pieces, aroused the greatest enthusiasm. The tenth Classical Concert, on January 27, was notable for the first performance at Glasgow of Elgar's 'Falstaff,' a composition that demands several hearings to secure its due appreciation. Mr. Gervase Elwes was the solo vocalist, singing Frank Bridge's 'Blow out, you bugles,' and a group of old English songs with consummate artistry. The programme of the eleventh Classical Concert, on February 3, included Madame Helen Hopekirk's Pianoforte Concerto in D, and some short numbers from a Serenata, the composer herself being the soloist. Madame Hopekirk's music is pleasing, but cannot be said to have distinction, and her playing, considered by present day standards, suffers somewhat by comparison. Excepting the Good Friday music from 'Parsifal,' by far the strongest composition played at this concert was William Wallace's 'Francis Villon,' of which Mr. Landon Ronald and the Scottish Orchestra gave an exceedingly fine interpretation. The other numbers were Mendelssohn's 'Fingal's Cave' Overture and 'L'Apprenti Sorcier,' by Dukas. The twelfth Classical Concert, on February 10, was notable for Mr. Landon Ronald's remarkably lucid reading of Elgar's second Symphony, in E flat, and a first performance here of John Ireland's Prelude, 'A Forgotten Rite.' Mr. Robert Radford, as solo vocalist, sang a Wagner excerpt with great effect.

The Choral Union, under Mr. Warren T. Clemens, gave a popular performance of 'Messiah' on January 21, and the same organization again appeared at the Saturday Popular Concert on January 24, singing Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' with Mr. William Hayle as soloist.

The announcement of two operatic stars—Miss Rosina Buckman and Mr. Maurice D'Oisly—for the Saturday Popular Concert on January 31, resulted in an overcrowded audience. The orchestral programme included five Wagner items from 'Lohengrin' and 'Meistersinger.'

Mr. John Clinto, whose second appearance this season was made at the Saturday concert on February 7, distinguished himself specially in some Italian songs.

For the programme originally announced for the Saturday concert of February 14 a Wagner programme was substituted with excellent results. Excerpts from 'The Flying Dutchman,' 'Siegfried,' 'Meistersinger,' 'Tristan and Isolde,' 'Rienzi,' &c., were played, and vocal numbers were given by Mr. Walter Hyde. Other concerts this month outside the Choral and Orchestral Union's scheme were a pianoforte recital by our distinguished townsman Mr. Frederic Lamond, a miscellaneous programme by Madame Clara Butt and party, and a remarkably good concert by the Beecham Orchestra under Mr. Albert Coates. At the last-mentioned, Brahms's first Symphony, Stravinsky's 'L'Oiseau de Feu,' and a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera 'The Tale of Tsar Saltan' were given, and Madame Renée Chemet charmed the audience by her playing of Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole.' Mr. Peter Dawson sang some songs with great acceptance.

HASTINGS

Since mid-January many attractive concerts have been held. In the Pavilion Mr. Julian Clifford's orchestra has continued busy to some purpose, and has responded nobly to the skilled guidance of its chief. Among the Russians, Glazounov's fourth Symphony was given a remarkable performance, while Kalinnikoff in G was a pleasing thing in Mr. Clifford's hands. The classics were represented by Schubert's 'Unfinished,' Beethoven's eighth, and Mozart in E flat, the last-named receiving an appropriately chaste reading. Frank Bridge's 'Lament' for strings, wherein he plumbs the depths of despair and gets new and surprising effects from his instruments, was beautifully played on January 22. Mr. Victor Benham meted out rougher handling to Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto than was necessary, and showed little respect either for the work or the pianoforte. Pierné's Harp Concerto revealed a very accomplished player in Miss Hilda Atkinson. Brahms's Violin Concerto gave Miss Lena Kontorovitch a chance to restrain her natural ardour which she did not take; but though the rhapsodical element obscured the tranquil, we were not oblivious to her undoubted gifts. Aubert's Pianoforte Concerto was given for the first time in the provinces. Miss Edith Barnett, who was heard in this work, should rank high among pianists, for she is both emotionally and technically sound. On February 12 Mr. Arnold Trowell figured as composer-violoncellist in his admirable paraphrase of Haydn's Concerto in D, and as composer-conductor in his own 'Niobe.' He shone most in the former rôle, for the Concerto is really enhanced by his treatment, and he played it as perhaps no other British violoncellist could. But his symphonic poem, with its air of fanaticism, dispelled any idea of his being a purist.

One concert was devoted to the orchestral works of Julian Clifford with a programme of astonishing fertility and variety. The Ballade in D impressed its hearers as being a work of real charm, and one which is sure to make its mark. Miss Marie Hall, in Wieniawski's second Concerto and some solos made a great hit on January 30. When all is so easy and natural it is hard to realise that anyone should play the violin less perfectly. Her playing still remains a miracle of true intonation. Some enjoyable violoncello and pianoforte playing was heard from Miss Helen Montgomery and Miss Daisy Quick at their joint recital on January 31.

On February 3 the Hastings Madrigal Society, conducted by Mr. Reginald Groves, joined forces with the Municipal Orchestra in a creditable performance of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast.' There was ample tone from the sopranos, but the other parts wanted more weight. For a first essay with orchestra it was not to be despised, and it should encourage the Society to still greater efforts. It was a one-man programme (Coleridge-Taylor), including the 'Othello' Suite and 'Bamboula Dance,' and its freedom from monotony was a tribute to composer and performance alike.

ISLE OF WIGHT

There has been great activity in musical matters throughout the Island, and much enthusiasm prevails. Mr. Albert Orton, since taking up his residence at Newport in July last year, has given some twenty organ recitals at the Parish Church, also a very successful pianoforte recital on November 27 at the 'Rink.' In October the amalgamation took place of two Choral Societies (of pre-war days) and the Orchestral Society, under the title of the 'Borough of Newport Philharmonic Society.' Mr. Albert Orton was elected conductor, and rehearsals commenced with a hundred and fifty members. The first programme (December 11) consisted of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A Tale of Old Japan' (first performance in the Island), and a miscellaneous second part, band and chorus numbering a hundred and eighty performers. The soloists were Madame Shergold, Miss Dora Arnell, and Messrs. Barrington Hooper and William Frith. On March 4 an orchestral concert will be given, when Mr. Orton will play a pianoforte concerto. 'Messiah' is announced for Good Friday evening, and Cowen's 'Sleeping Beauty' for the final concert in April. By invitation of the Governor, the Society visited Parkhurst Prison on January 22, and gave 'A Tale of Old Japan' and other selections to over six hundred convicts. The Hampshire Organists' Association members visited the Island in September, and the 'Isle of Wight Branch' was formed. On December 6 the members met at Newport, and Mr. Albert Orton, the chairman of the Branch, gave a lecture on 'Accompanying.'

At Ventnor, on February 6, the Island Orchestra, conducted by Miss Eveline Petherick, gave a concert with the following excellent programme of orchestral works: Beethoven's 'Prometheus' Overture, German's 'Nell Gwynn' Dances, Schubert's fifth Symphony, Coleridge-Taylor's 'Novelletten,' Elgar's 'Dream-children,' and Suppé's 'Poet and Peasant' Overture. The same music was played by this orchestra at Ryde on February 7.

LEEDS

To those who can go back and recall the popularity of the 'Italian Symphony' forty years ago it seems strange to describe its performance at the Leeds Saturday Orchestral Concert on February 7 as a welcome revival of a seldom-heard work. Yet such it was at Leeds, for I am unable to recall a single performance in the town for the past twenty-five years. So far as I can tell the only opportunities of hearing it in the neighbourhood of late have been at the Summer concerts at Harrogate, where a yearly series of over twenty weekly programmes makes it possible to include nearly all the classical Symphonies. We understand Mendelssohn's limitations nowadays, but such fresh, optimistic music was very pleasant to listen to. Mr. Hamilton Harty realised its gaiety and élan, and was well seconded by his orchestra, which was admirably suited in this work, the strings in particular being heard to exceptional advantage. Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat afforded a congenial opportunity to Mr. Frederick Dawson, who is nowhere more popular than in his native town, and whose brilliant bravura gave zest and vitality to his interpretation. Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations were included in the programme, but only a selection was played, an economy which was hardly worth while, especially in a work the interest of which is so well sustained from beginning to end. On January 19 the recently organized Ghent Quartet party, with Mr. Lloyd Hartley as pianist, introduced Elgar's Pianoforte Quintet to Leeds. Here, as elsewhere, it made an instantly favourable impression—indeed, the only doubt engendered in one's mind was occasioned by the thought that facile conquests are not always enduring. But it is difficult to believe that a work so replete with charm, so full of ideas, and so highly individual, can soon grow stale. The Adagio is in Elgar's finest style and noblest mood, and is characterised by genuine poetry and warmth of feeling. The concert also brought forward Vaughan Williams's poetic song-cycle, 'On Wenlock Edge,' with Mr. Henry Brearley as vocalist, and Wolf-Ferrari's agreeable Pianoforte Quintet in D flat, to all of which Mr. Bensley Ghent and his associates did justice.

The mid-day recitals at Leeds University have been resumed, and, with the greatly increased number of students, have had very large audiences, so that a love for good music should be inculcated in these young people at an impressionable age. On January 20 Miss Lily Simms and Mr. Lloyd Hartley played Elgar's recent Violin Sonata, and two movements from Brahms's in D minor, and on February 3 Mr. Stanley Kaye, a young Sheffield pianist, gave a recital in which he played MacDowell's powerful and dramatically expressive 'Sonata Tragica.' The Leeds Bohemian Concert on February 11 introduced String Quartets by Haydn, Beethoven (in B flat, Op. 130), and Arensky (in G, Op. 11), of which a party of local artists, with Mr. Bensley Ghent as leader, gave musically interpretations.

On January 24 M. Jaques-Dalcroze came to Leeds and, with the assistance of four girls who proved admirable exponents of his methods, demonstrated the value of the Dalcroze eurhythmic scheme. Quite apart from their charm as dances, or rhythmical pantomimes, it was made apparent that such exercises must be of great value in developing a keen sense of rhythm and encouraging alertness of perception. Ballad concerts by Messrs. Cramer's Concert Party on January 21, and Madame Clara Butt's party on February 4, call for no more than passing mention.

LIVERPOOL

There has been no concert given by the Philharmonic Society between January 13 and February 24, an unusually long interval of six weeks owing to the engagement of orchestral players at opera performances at Manchester and elsewhere. How to remedy this state of things is under consideration, and Mr. Ernest Newman has made the sensible suggestion that Liverpool and Manchester should run one orchestra to play the same programmes in both cities each week, and so save time and money in rehearsals without any clashing of engagements. The Philharmonic Choir has recently had the advantage of several special visits of Sir Henry Wood, in order to rehearse Vaughan Williams's 'Sea Symphony,' which is to be performed by the Philharmonic Society on March 2, under Sir Henry's direction.

Mr. Quinlan's fourth concert, on February 7, provided one of the finest orchestral performances heard here for many a day. It was given by the Beecham Orchestra, and conducted by Mr. Albert Coates, whose programme, a model of progressive interest and variety, commenced with Brahms and ending with Stravinsky. Mr. Coates certainly deepened our conviction of Brahms's first Symphony as great music, by an interpretation which was calm, confident, and well-balanced in its alternating strength and serenity. In especial the deep beauty of the slow movement and the elemental grandeur of the Finale found true expression. The picturesque music of his master Rimsky-Korsakov—two gorgeously-coloured movements from the Suite, 'The Tale of Tsar Saltan'—and Stravinsky's delirious 'Fire Bird' Dance found Mr. Coates no less resourceful and masterful. Lalo's piquant and glittering 'Symphonie Espagnole' was Madame Renée Chemet's opportunity, and it would be impossible to conceive a more surpassingly skilful and expressive performance of the solo violin part. A line is due to Mr. Peter Dawson's acceptable vocalism in Handel's 'Drop not, young lover,' which he sang very well.

Two distinguished musicians, Mr. Dan Godfrey and Dr. Arthur Somervell, attended a reception by the local members of the British Music Society at the handsome club-room which Messrs. Rushworth & Deaper have provided for the Society's use. At a public meeting held in the evening at St. George's Hall, with Dr. Pollitt in the chair, both visitors spoke with special reference to the artistic needs of Liverpool, first in respect of a large and central concert-room, and, secondly, as to the provision of a municipal orchestra. Neither of these ideas is exactly new, but it was interesting to hear from Mr. Godfrey how very little the municipal music at Bournemouth costs the ratepayers. So far the call had been only one-sixth of a penny in the pound. But Mr. Godfrey knows little about the conditions at Liverpool, and his assumption that municipal music here would actually be a paying concern without a similar and probably much larger call on the rates than at Bournemouth is thought to be a bit wide of the mark. Dr. Somervell took up a higher position in viewing the question as one of necessity in providing the people with a means of satisfying the deep longing for a fuller life which is at the bottom of all the social unrest. To Dr. Somervell the question was not whether it would pay. As a matter of fact, he said 'It didn't pay to get your hair cut.' At the present time the job is to convince the ratepayers that the provision of a municipal orchestra might have prevented the police strike of August last and the subsequent riots, which cost the city nearly £100,000, or a rate of 5d.

After an interval of four years, M. Jacques-Dalcroze recently paid another visit to Liverpool, accompanied by four lady experts from his famous school at Geneva. The demonstrations of his much-discussed system of 'Eurhythmic' exercises aroused the usual enthusiasm.

At the fourth concert of the Rodewald Concert Society on January 19 a strong personal interest was added to the programme by the presence of Mr. Frank Bridge, who himself accompanied a selection of his songs, which greatly commend themselves by the freshness of their ideas and modern expression. They were admirably sung by Miss Helen Anderton, a most sympathetic singer, and it was another pleasure to hear Mr. Bridge's pianoforte pieces, 'April,' 'Rosemary,' and 'Valse Capriccieuse,' delightfully played by Mr. Frederic Brandon.

At Mr. Max Mossel's third concert, on January 31, Mr. Lamond gave a notable performance of the 'Appassionata' Sonata, music in which he signally specialises. His exposition of the great work was finely balanced and proportionate, and free from excesses of modern pianism whether of time or tone. A young singer, Miss Dorothea Webb, made a highly favourable impression by her beautiful voice and artistic style in singing two groups of modern French and English songs, which included a notable combination in Debussy's setting of Villon's famous 'Ballade des Femmes de Paris,' with yet another English version by 'W. F. W.' The singer's other well-chosen items included Somervell's 'Twa Sisters of Binnorie' and Balfour Gardiner's 'Winter' ('When icicles hang').

At the Wednesday afternoon concerts at Crane Hall the players have included Mr. Josef Holbrooke, who gave a varied selection with acceptance, including his new fantasia, 'Barrage,' in which is at least a suggestion of heavy gunfire, and 'Affection,' which made an immediate appeal by its comparative simplicity and beauty. Mrs. St. George Moore and Miss Gertrude Morris also found favour as pianists, to whose number was added distinction by players of outstanding powers in Mr. Joseph Greene and Mr. Anderson Tyrer. The singers included Miss Vivian Edwards (who introduced folk-songs of Greece, Macedonia, and Serbia), Miss Gladys Moger, Miss Amy Taggart, Miss Edina Thraves, and Mr. F. George, while the violinists were Miss Constance le Mesurier and Miss Jo Lamb. The Warrington Musical Society performed Coleridge-Taylor's 'A Tale of Old Japan' on February 5, with Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Helen Anderton, Mr. W. Heselting, and Mr. J. Huntington as vocal principals. Mr. Frank H. Crossley conducted a very good performance, which ended with Wagner's 'Hail, bright abode' for orchestra and chorus. Another well-managed Society, the West Kirby Choral, sang Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius,' conducted by Dr. W. B. Brierley, on February 11. The vocal principals were Miss Astra Desmond, Mr. Joseph Adams, and Mr. Samuel Mann.

In Mr. Vasco Akeroyd—so well known at Liverpool as a violinist and as conductor of the Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Josef Holbrooke will find an amiable and accomplished companion and coadjutor during his musical tour in the West Indies.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT

The season 1920-21 will witness the turnover of the Hallé concerts to their pre-war footing, with twenty concerts—five on Saturday and the others on Thursday—a resident permanent conductor in Mr. Hamilton Harty, and an increase in the strings department of the band, which, if not attaining the strength of the Richter days, will yield a much more satisfactory balance than at present. Sir Thomas Beecham and Mr. Albert Coates will conduct two or three concerts each, as guest-conductors, and although the former relinquishes his position of musical adviser and director, he will still retain an active interest in the Society's doings.

This plan would seem to combine the advantages both of an orchestra mainly under one conductor with (for the public perhaps more than for the players) that infusion of freshness of method and outlook obtainable from visits by so distinguished guest-conductors.

Wednesday, February 11, 1920, should stand forth in British operatic and musical chronicles as the occasion of the first matinée performance of 'Parsifal,' representing as has been well said 'the highest achievement of day-time art in our City.' Manchester has recently been the Mecca of the musical North. Visitors from far and near have thronged its opera house, and the culmination was reached in the week which brought this 'Parsifal' matinée, that was followed the next evening by the Beecham production of the 'Mastersingers.' The 'Parsifal' representations have steadily matured, more particularly in the orchestral playing. Mr. Percy Pitt took charge during Mr. Coates's orchestral tour, and perhaps emphasized rather more the symbolical solemnity of the drama. Some have found it more tedious, but gaining a heightened mystical significance. Variations in the original cast have been made owing to illness—Foster Richardson vice Norman Allin (Gurnemanz); Edmund Burke vice Percy Heming (Amfortas), while

'Parsifal' has been sung by Mullings and Hyde alternately. The Grail Knights' chorus has not much improved, but the latest performances, coming after the despatch of these notes, bid fair to attain a still higher unity of effect.

The 'Mastersingers' production, on February 12, laboured under certain disabilities. Sir Thomas Beecham's absence from Manchester until the very week of production threw the full weight of final preparation into a too brief period. Changes in the cast were necessary owing to illness and other causes, and two members at least were on the verge of breakdown at the fall of the curtain. The wonder is that so great a task was carried through at all. This opening performance produced nothing like the same sense of æsthetic satisfaction as did 'Parsifal,' although the orchestral playing was of a higher order. My first impression (to be confirmed or otherwise by further experience during the last week) was that, as a whole, it was not so mature a production as was that memorable occasion during the ill-fated Denhof venture some years ago. The cast did not give one the same sense of sufficiency and efficiency, possibly due to the sense of strain under which all participating must have laboured, and attributable to causes above-mentioned. The Beecham Company possesses in Messrs. Austin and Ranalow two singers who played Hans Sachs alternately during the Denhof tour years ago. Mr. Ranalow, at very short notice, prepared afresh the rôle of Sachs, owing to Mr. Edwin Shanks's inability. Mr. D'Oisly played David, and the other members of the cast were represented as follows, viz., Pogner (Edmund Burke), Walther (Webster Millar), Beckmesser (Herbert Langley), Eva (Miriam Licette), and Magdalene (Edith Clegg). Among the men's parts Messrs. Ranalow and D'Oisly stood forth as the two chief pillars of the production. Mr. Langley's Beckmesser struck me as a distinct misconception of Wagner's intention. It should be purely satirical; pedantry was meant to be guyed, but suggested in the shy, mirthful, nimble 'dig in the ribs' manner rather than in the realist comedy manner used by Mr. Langley. One would respectfully submit that his somewhat boisterous buffoonery is quite alien to the part. Walther in Webster Millar's hands will develop materially before the Manchester season ends. It possesses already many elements of distinction, conspicuously that imaginative suggestion of improvisation. Not unnaturally Manchester music-lovers are following the career of this native singer with intense interest, and recall his singing of the Prize Song at Hallé's in Richter's last year, an achievement of such exaltation as to inspire wonder whether he would ever have the chance to interpret the rôle. That was one of the few occasions when the veteran conductor beamed satisfaction.

On ocean-going liners the most fascinating personality for me is the wireless operator, and my imagination was ever stimulated when the shrill tell-tale hum of his apparatus was heard. Beecham has that same uncanny faculty of getting into the swiftest responsive touch with every member of his audience and of his forces. The whole theatre infallibly maintains sympathetic contact with the intense vibrations radiating from this high-powered human dynamo. Detention in Paris prevented his conducting De Lara's 'Nail' on February 5. At two or three hours' notice Mr. Clarence Raybould took charge. Miss Buckman received a cable just before the performance telling her of a great domestic bereavement, but bravely stuck to her post. Such a crowd has never before thronged the opera house. The splendour of the mise-en-scène left one breathless with wonder. Mr. Charles Ricketts has excelled the Russians at their best. The cast included Miss Buckman, Messrs. Mullings, Heming, and Hyde. There was every element present for a memorable night, save the all-important one of a composer's ability to make the life-blood of musical inspiration course through the veins of a thoroughly romantic story. Only in the changeful rhythms of the Café dances in the second Act was there any evidence of vitality. For the rest the opera is noticeably anæmic, and the abiding impressions are of the art of Charles Ricketts rather than of De Lara.

Mr. Clarence Raybould has definitely 'made good' as conductor during this season. It has already been stated that he filled the breach in 'Nail'; 'Falstaff' and 'Figaro' revealed his instinctive qualifications even more clearly. 'Figaro' now runs like the beautifully balanced piece of human mechanism that it is, without jarring or jolting; but all the same it needs a governor to prevent it racing away, and, slightly to vary the mechanical metaphor, Mr. Raybould does not make the mistake of always driving on the fast pulley, in this respect showing great discernment. The main features in the 'Figaro' cast remain undisturbed—and wisely so. In the lesser ones every opportunity for judicious variation is used, with happy results, when once close adjustment has been secured.

'Prince Igor' has made a record in that extra performances other than those originally advertised have had to be given, with Mr. Goossens in charge in the absence of Mr. Coates. Textile Manchester was keenly interested, both in 'Prince Igor' and 'Nail,' in the fact that many of the gorgeously rich colour effects in the garments were largely obtained in printed and stencilled cottons—some patterns used being procurable in ordinary drapers' shops. So much for the scenic artists' discernment.

The Quinlan orchestral concert again clashed with a 'Parsifal' evening. It is always difficult truly to assess a touring orchestra. Each performance is practically an additional rehearsal, and by the time Manchester is reached each player is thoroughly at ease, and yet not too familiar with the programme as to be stale. The band of London players under Mr. Coates was the fullest-toned one I have heard in this country since 1914. Coates's reading of Brahms's Symphony No. 1 was essentially virile. His phrasing had the lithe, taut, muscular quality of the athlete in training—resilient and resourceful. After a longish operatic dose, all one's senses thrilled responsively to the call of big stuff like this, and everybody in the hall seemed to feel the spaciousness of its horizon.

The Tuesday mid-day audiences have recently had experiences so varied as the big Hugo Wolf songs sung by Mr. Kingsley Lark and an Eurhythmic display by Miss Elsie Findlay and assistants, and then they go off to the Royal Exchange a few yards away, buying and selling mills or shares, cotton and yarn and cloth, or worrying over falling exchanges and impending labour troubles. Those brief minutes snatched from business cares must help to make life more sane and wholesome.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT

For many years Newcastle has had to be content with, at best, two operatic visits, each of a fortnight's duration per twelvemonth. At present the town is revelling in the luxury of a seven weeks' season, and has had the opportunity of hearing the first performance of Alick McLean's 'Quentin Durward,' which was given a warm reception by a full house. The opera is bright and tuneful, though at places it tends to lapse into the conventional. Quite a notable event was the revival of 'Tristan and Isolde,' which had not been heard here for several years. Crowded audiences have been a consistent feature of the Carl Rosa Company's season, and this should encourage the Company to give Newcastle more attention in future.

On January 14, Messrs. H. Sheepshanks and Ernest Sharp gave a pianoforte and violin recital in which the principal items were Elgar's Sonata (Op. 82) and Mozart's in B flat. The former work received a quite spirited performance.

Messrs. Carl Fuchs and E. L. Bainton, at a 'cello and pianoforte recital on January 19, introduced Debussy's Sonata for this combination, when the work received its first performance at Newcastle. The remainder of the programme was drawn from Scarlatti, Bach, Beethoven, Reger, Elgar, Rachmaninov, Sinding, and Moszkowski.

Another pianoforte and violin recital, by Miss A. M. Eckford and Mr. A. Wall, took place on January 26, and again the programme showed an interesting variety of periods and styles—Scarlatti, Bach, Schumann, Chopin, Debussy, Ravel, Parry, and Bainton all being represented.

The Catterall String Quartet played on January 28 to a large audience, giving an exquisite performance of Debussy's Quartet (Op. 10), Beethoven's in B flat (Op. 130), and Ernest Walker's 'Phantasie.' The last-named work possesses great charm, and is distinctly individual. It is a matter for regret that the composer's name does not figure more frequently in concert programmes.

Miss Gladys Willis, a very promising young pianist, who is still in her teens, gave a recital on February 3, when her programme included Beethoven's 'Sonata Appassionata,' and items from Chopin, Liszt, and Paganini.

The Newcastle Bach Choir, under Mr. W. G. Whittaker, gave its second concert of British music on February 7. A programme combining a happy intermingling of ancient and modern, grave and gay, attracted quite a large audience that obviously thoroughly enjoyed the artistic fare provided. The choral items, which were unaccompanied, consisted of Wilbye's madrigals 'Softly, O softly,' and 'Down in a valley'; Dowland's Ayre, 'Now, O now, I needs must part'; Morley's ballet, 'Shoot, false love'; Balfour Gardiner's folk-song settings, 'The Three Ravens' and 'The hunt is up'; and two Scottish melodies, 'The Captain's Lady' and 'The Deil's awa', set by W. G. Whittaker. These were interspersed with pianoforte solos by Mr. E. L. Bainton, who gave brilliant interpretations of representative pieces by John Ireland, Frank Bridge, and Percy Grainger.

The Newcastle Philharmonic Orchestra gave its second concert on Sunday afternoon, January 25, the programme consisting of Dvorák's 'Carnival Overture,' Elgar's 'Enigma Variations,' Grainger's 'Molly on the shore,' Borodin's 'Danse Polovstienne' (from 'Prince Igor'), and the late Ernest Farrar's 'Heroic Elegy.' Mr. E. J. Potts sang Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea,' and Mr. E. L. Bainton conducted.

NORWICH

The Philharmonic Society continued its serious course on February 12 with two most successful concerts. In the afternoon the chief items of the programme were César Franck's fine Symphony in D minor, and Lalo's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, the solo part in which was played by the Belgian 'cellist, M. Georges Pitsch, who was several times recalled after an exceptionally fine performance. Miss Olive Sturgess sang an air from Puccini's 'La Tosca,' with orchestra, and the concert finished with a vigorous presentation of the 'Meistersinger' Overture. St. Andrew's Hall was filled to its utmost capacity.

In the evening the concert was more or less of a popular character, and included the first movement of Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor, the solo part being played by an exceptionally clever young pianist, a native of Norwich, Miss Doris Rena Cocks. She had a great reception at the close of a really fine performance. The programme also included a selection from Gounod's 'Faust,' with Miss Olive Sturgess, Mr. A. E. Senior, and Mr. Joseph Jones as soloists, and the Norwich Choral Society. The hall was full. Dr. Frank Bates conducted both concerts.

NOTTINGHAM

The National Federation of Discharged Sailors and Soldiers benefited by a concert given in the Theatre Royal on January 25. The Federation's Military Band played three selections. The Nottingham Gleemen gave Elgar's 'It's oh! to be a wild wind,' with admirable restraint and delicacy, and followed with the same composer's 'Feasting I watch,' and Sullivan's 'The Beleaguered.' Solos were sung by Miss Gladys White (soprano), Madame Ethel Parkin (contralto), Mr. Herbert Smith (tenor), and Mr. Harry Topham (bass). An interesting lecture on Church Music was given by Dr. Radcliffe on February 1, when illustrations were supplied by the Nottingham Harmonic Glee Society under Mr. Gilbert Summers. Items effectively rendered included 'Come unto Me' (A. Page), 'God is a Spirit' (Sterndale Bennett), 'The Wilderness' (Goss), and 'Music All Powerful' (Walmisley). The tenor Passion music from 'Messiah' was sung by Mr. G. Allen. Mr. Johnson was aided by Miss Minnie Wilson on February 1, when this clever pianist collaborated in a performance of Guilman's 'Scherzo Capriccioso.' Miss Wilson also gave Mozart's 'Pastorale Variée' and Paderewski's 'Cracovienne Fantastique.' Mr. Johnson's solos comprised the 'William Tell' Overture, Merkel's Sonata in E minor, Wolstenholme's Ballade in D flat, and two attractive examples of MacDowell.

Miss Jean Sterling Mackinlay proved a powerful attraction at the Albert Hall People's Concert on February 4. Miss Mackinlay's versatility and originality were displayed in all her work. Organ solos by Mr. Johnson were also included in the programme.

The Derby Post Office Musical Society gave an excellent account of its capabilities on January 21, under Mr. John Daulby Peake. Among other choral numbers were Elgar's 'Land of Hope and Glory,' and 'As torrents in Summer.' The choir's most ambitious effort, Wagner's 'Hail, bright abode,' reflected credit on all concerned. Miss May Hargreaves displayed a flexible soprano in such songs as Ardit's 'Il Bacio,' and Mr. J. Coleman—of Lichfield Cathedral—sang with artistic effect. Mrs. J. W. King's solos were infused with dramatic fervour, her finely trained contralto voice being fully appreciated. Mr. W. Daltrey's violin solos showed great executive skill.

St. Luke's Choral Society gave its inaugural performance on January 21, when Cowen's 'Rose Maiden' was chosen. Under Dr. A. G. Claypole the new Society revealed much promise. The soloists were Miss E. Slack, Madame E. Mayle, Mr. H. Baylis, and Mr. T. Barton. Mr. Frederick Dawson gave a lecture-recital in the Temperance Hall, Derby, on January 22, illustrating his remarks by examples from the works of Bach, Beethoven (the 'Waldstein' Sonata), Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, Ravel, Bridge, and Scriabin. The Corporation Committee is once more to be congratulated on the class of music offered, and the appreciation it received.

The Long Eaton Orchestral Society's second concert was held on February 5, Mr. F. Mountney conducting. Dr. F. H. Wood's variations on 'My Love's an Arbutus' possessed special interest, from the composer's long connection with matters musical at Long Eaton. Mr. A. Trowell's cello solos were brilliantly executed, and Miss Lucy Nuttall's beautiful contralto voice evoked much applause.

The Louth Choral Society's chorus and orchestra presented Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' on February 5, under Mr. O. M. Price. The principals were Miss H. Talbot, Mr. J. W. Hepworth (Lincoln), Miss Evelyn Alexander (Hull), and Mrs. F. Tyler (pianoforte).

The long-looked for visit of the Beecham Symphony Orchestra to Leicester took place on February 10. The programme opened with Beethoven's seventh Symphony, other orchestral numbers comprising the Good Friday music from 'Parsifal,' the last movement of Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Scheherazade' suite, and Elgar's 'Introduction and Allegro.' Madame Renée Chemet played Saint-Saëns's third Violin Concerto with her usual brilliance, while Miss Edna Thornton sang the aria 'O Righteous God' from 'Rienzi.' It speaks well for Leicester's appreciation of a fine concert when we find that few members of the audience left before the end of a three hours' performance.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT

The University Musical Society, as befits its peculiar character, busies itself with the study and presentation of works that do not ordinarily come within the scope of the average choral organization. In this way the Society has done good service by the revival of certain of Purcell's compositions and of Bach's lesser-known Church Cantatas. At the last concert however the members essayed a modern work, Parry's 'The Chivalry of the Sea.' A small choir, drawn mainly from present and past students, gave, under Dr. Coward's direction, an accurate and expressive performance of the vocal portions, while a string orchestra led by Mr. John Collins, and supplemented by judicious filling-in of the wind parts by Mrs. Patten at the pianoforte, played the characteristic instrumental portions. The music is an impressive setting of Robert Bridges's touching tribute to the men of the sea. Its suitability for a small choral body was made manifest, and musical societies will no doubt in increasing numbers take up what is one of the great English composer's most beautiful works. Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion' was also performed, though with less convincing zest, under the same conditions. A newly-formed quartet party, the Sheffield String Quartet, played Beethoven's Op. 18, No. 3, and works by Dvorák, Tchaikovsky, and Grainger. The ensemble was polished to a degree, while the intonation and phrasing betokened careful and informative rehearsal.

At the fourth Sheffield Subscription Concert a quartet from the Beecham Opera Company—Miss Agnes Nicholls and Messrs. Frank Mullings, Norman Allin, and William

Michael—appeared in a concert version of the Nile Scene (Act 3) from 'Aïda.' Under stress of the dramatic situations the singers discarded the reticent conventions of the concert platform, with great gain to the import of the music. The experiment was so successful as to ensure a continuance of similar 'operative' concerts in the future. Selections from 'Othello,' 'Il Seraglio,' 'La Bohème,' 'Pagliacci,' and 'Faust' were also included in the programme.

The resumption of the Foxon Five o'Clock Concerts furnishes a fortnightly music-making which possesses several unique features. Pride of place is given to the music rather than to the performers, and some interesting and little-known works are heard at each concert. Glazounov's first Pianoforte Sonata, finely played by Miss Helen Guest, was thus heard for the first time at Sheffield. Despite its mannerisms and the limitation of its emotional outlook, this number proved to be of arresting beauty. Another masterly work heard at these concerts was Dvorák's Sonata for pianoforte and violin, played with intelligent penetration by Miss Minnie Wilson and Mr. Allan Smith. Some unfamiliar songs by Bantock were expressively sung by Mr. Harry Skeritt, and Mr. Joseph Markham was sincere and artistic in Bach's 'I know that my Redeemer liveth' (from the Cantata of the same name).

"A brilliant and genial new work—always very melodious, richly scored, and invariably distinguished by an atmosphere of romantic charm."—Daily Chronicle.

"The Diversions increase in interest. The Fourth and Sixth may be specially mentioned as being the perfection of musical light music."—Morning Post.

"Contrast is one of the leading features of the work, specially marked in the Third Diversion, which might illustrate a rural fête of bucolic frolic."—Referee.

"The delicate Second Diversion is a gem of joyous animation."—Globe.

"It is brilliant and cheerful, extremely clever, and has the spontaneity which can only be achieved by complete mastery of resource."—Star.

"It was full of grace, melodious, and, above all, lucidly expressed. The Fifth Diversion is a fine exposition of a valse theme."—Weekly Dispatch.

"The composer has lost none of his virility and joyousness—it is fresh open-air music."—Observer.

"Edward German's Theme and Six Divisions provide us with a whiff of sweet English briar-rose—very refreshing."—World

"It is a singularly smooth, and even delightful piece of work"—Manchester Guardian.

NOS. 1 AND 2, PRICE 6d. EACH; NO. 3, PRICE 4d.

The old Cryes of London have formed the subject of interesting articles, poems, and pictures, ever since old John Lydgate (1370-1450), a Benedictine of Bury St. Edmund's Abbey, wrote his "London Lackpenny."

Hindley, in his interesting but rather discursive book on "The Cries of London," says: "From the time of Elizabeth to that of Queen Victoria, authors, artists, and printers combined, have presented the cries of Itinerant Traders of London in almost similar form and in various degrees of quality, from the roughest and worst wood-cut blocks to the finest copper and steel-plate engravings or skilfully-wrought etchings. While many of the early English dramatists often introduced the subject, eminent composers were wont to set to music, as a Catch, Glee, or Roundelaye, all the London Cries then most in vogue. They were, I hear, 'ryhte merrie songs,' and the music was well engraved."—(J. F. B.)

Says one of our Craftsmen :

“ I AM SURE OF THE QUALITY, BECAUSE I OFTEN TRY THE STRINGS MYSELF.”

“ And the tone is superb. Lots of my musician friends tell me that these are the finest strings they have ever had the good fortune to play upon.”

“ What’s more, every day we receive letters of praise from all classes of musicians telling us how good “ Cathedral ” and “ Summit ” strings are. If you yourself want to see how well we make steel and covered strings, ask us to send you a FREE sample.”

“ You will never go back to the foreign brands again. You won’t have to pay more, either, because “ Cathedral ” and “ Summit ” strings are CHEAPER as well as far better than any strings ever made before.”

OF ALL MUSIC DEALERS.

CATHEDRAL STRINGS.—Beautifully packed in boxes of a dozen. Every string in its transparent, dust- and damp-proof envelope, and each string tissue-wrapped in addition. A delight to the eye when taken from the envelope, and a revelation in tonal-quality when first tried on the instrument.

SUMMIT STRINGS.—Also packed in dozen boxes, and made in the same careful way. A popular string at a popular price. Each string is enclosed in a black, gilt-lettered, damp- and dust-proof envelope. A strikingly fine-toned string. All British Strings (“ Cathedral ” and “ Summit ”) are best tried on your instrument.

IMPORTANT NEW CHAMBER MUSIC.

EUGÈNE GOOSSENS

SONATA FOR VIOLIN AND PIANO

OP. 21.

Price 7s. 6d. net cash.

This new Sonata is not only a very important addition to British Chamber Music and one of the most interesting recent Sonatas, it is among the finest, most mature, and imaginative works by Eugène Goossens, whose brilliant gifts it reveals in an entirely new light.

FRANCIS POULENC

RAPSODIE NÈGRE

For Flute, Clarinet, Two Violins, Viola, Violoncello, Piano, and Medium Voice.

Price 10s. net cash.

This work, by one of the leaders of the very youngest French Composers, has all the characteristic qualities of the new tendencies in France, a reaction against excessive impressionism, and direction towards more concrete musical forms.

room for

The Weber Small Grand Piano

Length:
4 ft. 10 ins.,
Width:
4 ft. 10 ins.

This instrument is the latest product of the famous Weber factory at Hayes, Middlesex. It is a triumph alike for its producers and for British craftsmanship, for never have any foreign makers succeeded in obtaining so rare a tone in an instrument of such limited proportions. Less than five feet in length, it occupies almost the same space as an ordinary upright piano, but has all the advantages of tone and appearance that characterise the Grand type of piano . . .

The tone of the Weber Concert Grand Piano has made that instrument the choice of the world's chief pianists, and in this miniature model all the beauties of the Weber tone are preserved. This wonderful new piano may be seen and played in our showrooms; it is obtainable upon easy payment terms that make it as accessible as an upright piano.

ROGERS

There are other Pianos more widely advertised and better known than the Rogers, but there is none that is so irresistible in its appeal to the musician.

The Rogers Piano represents the careful development of an artistic ideal, and the musician is quick to realize the possibilities it offers him in its delicacy and responsiveness of touch and variations of tone-colour.

Marshall & Rose

SUPERB GRAND & UPRIGHT PIANO FORTES

THE PIANOS WHICH INSPIRE

THOSE who purchase the Superb Marshall and Rose Pianoforte can always be confident that their instrument will win the highest measure of praise on account of its superlatively sympathetic qualities. The Marshall and Rose Pianoforte in the making has been treated with the same care and tenderness as a rare violin; it is the supreme outcome of years of experience and steady striving after an ideal; every part of it has literally been trained towards perfection, and the result is an instrument which is almost human in its responsiveness.

The artist who avails himself of this wonderful instrument as a means of self-expression will find that his message never fails in its appeal when given to an audience in such an exceptional manner. Real connoisseurs of Music are convinced that the magic and beauty of the immortal works of the great Composers can only be adequately realised when interpreted on the Piano of Perfection—the instrument which bears the name of MARSHALL AND ROSE.

The Marshall and Rose Grand and Upright Pianofortes can also be obtained containing THE WORLD-FAMED ANGELUS PIANO-PLAYER, which gives you a Piano possessing every musical quality and the ability to play it.

SONGS OF DISTINCTION

The Harvester's Night Song Poem by FOSTER RICHARDSON Music by H. BAYNTON-POWER

First introduced to the public by Mr. NORMAN ALLIN. This song has established its claim amongst the first favourites of all contralto and baritone vocalists.

Think Tenderly of Me Words and Music by VERNON SHARP

Although very simple in construction, this little "heart song" has made an immediate and direct appeal. Miss ADA FORREST, Mr. ALFRED HEATHER, and Mr. GERALD O'BRIEN amongst other eminent artists regard it as one of the gems of their repertoire.

The Message of the Rose Words by ED. OXENFORD Music by MAY HUNTER

The many admirers of Madame ELSA STRALIA, who have heard her rendering of this gracefully written song on a COLUMBIA RECORD, are unanimous in praise of its "quaint old English charm."

Rest at Eventide Words by HAROLD SIMPSON Music by H. BAYNTON-POWER

Admirers of the "Harvester's Night Song" will welcome this new song by the same composer. Again we have an exceptionally fine lyric with an underlying philosophy, set to a melody that faithfully reflects its message.

All the above may be had from Music Dealers throughout the Kingdom or direct from the Publishers, post free 2/1 each.

PIANO PLAYING KEPT UP without keyboard practising.

Not the least of the many benefits which the use of my System confers upon pianists is that of being able to keep "in practice" without keyboard practising.

Even when circumstances make keyboard work impossible for several months, definite progress is often made in touch, increased powers of execution, and in general command over the keyboard.

This is one of the many reasons why pianists of all grades of proficiency should take my Postal Course.

Sir Frederick Bridge, C.V.O., has strongly recommended my System, the advantages of which, he stated, he could cordially endorse from his own personal experience. More than 12,000 successful students add their testimony.

CHARLES TREE.

ON VOCAL EASE. THE LONG LIFE OF THE VOICE.

In his Recital-Lectures on Voice, Mr. Tree shows the definite reason for so comparatively few of our fine young voices keeping their purity and freshness. The "camouflage" which so many so-called teachers make use of is their chief "stock-in-trade." "Open your mouth to the size of half-a-crown." "Push out your tongue, and sing." "Take in breath until you feel your eyes bulging, then sing." These are examples of what is taking place, and the cause of so many failures.

Italian-French-English productions, when correct, are one and the same thing—the absence of any physical change from true speech into song. The difficulty of singing is its simplicity.

Recital-Lecture.....Nottingham.....March 22.
"Elijah".....Accrington.....March 24.
Berlioz's "Faust".....Leicester.....March 25.
"Creation".....Blackpool.....April 2.

Bournemouth Times, February 28, 1920: "A vocalist so popular and successful for so long a period could not fail to have something of interest to say. He touched on points vital to success, and told his auditors more in an hour than could be represented by many guineas by way of fees for lessons."

Mr. Moodie, of Edinburgh, writes, March 1, 1920: "That your lecture is doing a world of good is beyond doubt. I hear enthusiastic reports from Dunfermline."

Mr. Tree does very little teaching, but is willing to give his Recital-Lecture wherever vocal art is seriously studied.

There were 929 Candidates for Diplomas, of which number 535 passed, 378 failed, and 16 were absent.

The HIGHER EXAMINATIONS for the DIPLOMAS of ASSOCIATE (A.L.C.M.) and LICENTIATE (L.L.C.M.) are held in London and at certain Provincial and Colonial centres in APRIL, JUNE, JULY, and DECEMBER; and for the DIPLOMAS of ASSOCIATE IN MUSIC (A.MUS.L.C.M.), LICENTIATE IN MUSIC (L.MUS.L.C.M.), the TEACHER'S DIPLOMA (L.C.M.), and FELLOWSHIP (F.L.C.M.) in JUNE, JULY, and DECEMBER.

The NEXT LOCAL EXAMINATION in all branches of practical and theoretical music will be held at Scotch and Irish centres in JUNE and at all other centres in JULY, the last days of entry being respectively May 15 and June 15.

REPRESENTATIVES are required to form LOCAL CENTRES in vacant districts in Great Britain and all other parts of the world. Ladies or gentlemen willing to undertake the duties should apply to the Secretary for particulars. SCHOOL CENTRES may also be arranged.

GOLD, SILVER, and BRONZE MEDALS and BOOK PRIZES are awarded at the Examinations in accordance with the printed regulations. Full details will be found in the Syllabus.

The TEACHING DEPARTMENT of the College provides COMPLETE MUSICAL EDUCATION for Students, Amateur or Professional. PRIVATE LESSONS are given in Pianoforte, Singing, Violin, Harp, Organ, Harmony, Counterpoint, and Musical Composition (including Fugue, Orchestration, and Musical History), Mandoline, Guitar, and Elocution; also in Violoncello, Flute, Clarinet, and all other orchestral instruments. LESSONS MAY COMMENCE FROM ANY DATE.

There are CLASSES in Pianoforte, Singing, Violin, Elocution, Harmony, Counterpoint, Ear Training, Sight-Singing, &c.; also SPECIAL COURSE of TRAINING for Teachers of Music, and PROFESSIONAL COURSE for Pianists, Violinists, and Vocalists. Fine THREE-MANUAL ORGAN (39 stops) in the College Concert Hall, available for lessons and practice.

The College is open from 9.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. The staff consists of over 90 professors.

The ORCHESTRA, OPERA CLASS, CHOIR, STRING QUARTET CLASS, DRAMATIC CLASS, and CONDUCTORS' CLASS meet each week.

The 251st Students' Concert took place in the Concert Hall of the College on March 25th.

The SUMMER TERM commences on Monday, April 19th.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE:

"This Edition of Classic Songs being primarily intended for teaching purposes, a few cuts have been made in excessively long symphonies, and some difficult passages in the accompaniments have been simplified.

"The new English versions of Foreign lyrics aim at being essentially vocal and at rendering the general sense of the originals rather than a pedantic translation."

'MUSICAL TIMES' COMPETITIONS

We have pleasure in announcing the awards in the Competition for an Anthem and a Part-song, the prize in each case being Twenty-five Guineas offered by the Proprietors of the 'MUSICAL TIMES.' Nearly two hundred compositions were submitted.

Of these, by far the greater number were part-songs. It is worthy of note, too, that the standard of excellence was higher in this section. Not many of the anthem composers showed an ability to be simple and at the same time original.

The anthem prize was won by 'Salvator Mundi,' for a setting of a paraphrase of the Latin hymn, 'O Loving Saviour,' and the part-song prize by 'Sul Ponticello,' the words being a poem called 'Three Sleeps.' The decision of the three judges was unanimous.

The successful composers were found to be:

and

MR. JOHN GERRARD WILLIAMS

Dr. Wadely's anthem will be issued with our May number. The part-song will appear at a later date.

The unsuccessful manuscripts will be returned to the senders in due course.

HAMILTON HARTY

An autodidact; an independent, who puts Berlioz before Wagner and can perceive spots on such luminaries as Brahms and César Franck; and a British national.

Such a few years ago would have appeared impossible qualifications in a conductor of the Hallé Orchestra. The last-named would in itself have been pretty well fatal to a candidate for the appointment, quite apart from autodidactic independence. But there has been a European war; and Mr. Hamilton Harty, ungarlanded with the laurels of Leipsic, Bayreuth, or Berlin, steps into the hieratic succession of Herren Hallé, Richter, and Balling.

What all the world knows about Mr. Harty is that he is the prince of accompanists; that he is Irish and a composer; that his wife is Miss Agnes Nicholls. What those who have the pleasure of his acquaintance know is that he does not belie that wise-demure and sub-sardonic air which may sometimes be detected in his platform appearance, and that his modesty urbanely says: 'I confess to private views about this or that great man of the past; if they are not yours, it is very likely my fault.' Mr. Harty is one of those musicians who can talk pungently, wittily, and well on the art—the Irishman's birthright, of course.

MUSIC AND THE IRISH

Hamilton Harty is Irish to the core, but is not a musical nationalist.

'I was'—so he answers the inquisitive—'brought up on international music, on Anglican Church services, and the classical chamber writers. I am sorry I can't bring folk-music into the story. Such little folk-music as there used to be in my native County Down was not Irish, but Scottish. Music in my early impressions did not mean fiddlers at fairs or immemorial drinking-songs in taverns, or indeed anything more Bohemian or picturesque than my father's organ-playing (he was organist at the Episcopal Church at Hillsborough, where I was born), and chamber music at home, where my mother led the family string quartet. I can recall hearing as a small child the sonatas of Mozart and Beethoven being played every night downstairs as I lay falling to sleep. At the age of nine I was parish organist and choirmaster at Brookmount, near by, my father helping me with the choir.

'He was a born musician—self-taught, and an unbeliever in academic teaching. Anyone, according to him, could learn to play a musical instrument if he had the will and just a hand-book to point to the rudiments. And, upon my word, I won't say I think he was wrong, though his was not the way to produce virtuosos. The use of a modicum of technique for him was as a key wherewith to enter the delightful pastures and still waters of the classics. He set me on that way, and as a small boy I could play all "The Forty-Eight" of Bach by heart. And later on a similar procedure served me well enough in matters such as orchestration. What more does one want for that beyond a collection of scores to see how it is done and the chance to hear on an orchestra how it sounds? A booklet may be useful to tell you that flutes can't play below C or violins below G. I have never had a lesson in orchestration.

'The worst of life in Ireland is that there are practically no orchestras. I was sixteen and organist at Bray, just outside Dublin, before I fell in with any sort of orchestral music. Previously to this I had served a term as organist at St. Barnabas, Belfast. At Dublin I was admitted into the local orchestra as a violist, and a very inferior violist I was; but the orchestra itself was not superlative. This music-making set me writing overtures and things, and a symphony was successful at the Feis Ceoil. [Sir Henry Wood has since done it in London.] And at Dublin I fell willingly captive to Dr. Michel Esposito.

'This Italian musician is the presiding genius of all that there is of music in Ireland. As an all-round musician he is, I should say, unsurpassed in Europe. I send him for criticism everything I write, and put as implicit faith in him now as when a boy—he has always been right.' One of the jokes between us, however, has always been his refusal when I first asked him to give me pianoforte lessons: "You will never play the pianoforte," he said, "your thumbs are too short."

(A sketch by a Hallé bandsman.)

'As a pianoforte teacher he is marvellous. His pianoforte class at the Royal Irish Academy of Music is worthy of comparison with those of the biggest centres. Such polish! such beautiful tone!'

'Why don't we, then, hear something of young Irish musicians over here?'

'Well, the Irish musical student is greatly facile, and still more greatly indolent. He reaches a certain point and then drifts. Ireland offers him no scope; yet, as a rule, he is reluctant to leave home. That did not hold good with me. At twenty I came over here. I worked at accompanying, and enthralingly interesting I found it, with such a variety of music does one thus become acquainted, and with such a variety of artists—little and big, but all human. I wrote for the festivals—"Ode to a Nightingale" for Cardiff, "The Mystic Trumpeter" for Leeds. I married. I conducted the London Symphony Orchestra.'

BERLIOZ AND INTUITION

Two sympathies at least Mr. Harty will have in common with Manchester when he takes up his duties next autumn: the heartiest admiration for the Hallé Orchestra and a strong leaning towards Berlioz. He also rates high the musical sensibility of the Manchester public as compared with Londoners; and here, again, Manchester will be in full agreement with him.

'The "Hallé" is the alertest of bands. Its wind is the most beautiful in the country, and the leader, Mr. Catterall, I hold to be the best of our native violinists. Inevitably the Orchestra suffered during the war, and as much as anything from being pulled first this way, then that, by incessant changes of conductors. Of course I shall not be going to them as a stranger. I have no apprehensions, for I know that though there is no possible bluffing of such a first-rate orchestra, and no bullying, they can be got to do anything if one will explain himself quietly and rationally.

'In my work I shall come in touch too with various choral societies, and here a thorny problem exists which to my mind has hardly been satisfactorily handled in the past. The problem concerns the relations of the choirmaster who trains the singers and the conductor who directs the public performance. If performances of the larger and more modern choral works are to be brought nearer adequacy, the conductor must in future have more say in the preparation of the choir.

'One of the pleasures of the musician at Manchester is in the subtlety of the audience there. Yes, they are not only keen but also subtle. The difference is immense between them and Londoners, who so often seem to be listening with closed minds. A London audience is often simply not to be won, but sits in apathy as much as to say that as a sufficient impression of such and such a composer, or such and such a work had been formed years ago, no fresh one is desirable. I should despair of charming London with Berlioz in the way in which Manchester has lately been charmed. This leaning of theirs towards Berlioz suits me, because Berlioz is one of the gods of my idolatry. We shall be having quite a lot of Berlioz at Manchester next winter—the "Fantastic" again, and "The Damnation of Faust" complete, "Harold in Italy," and portions of his opera, "The Trojans."

'Berlioz and Mozart are my private deities. I cannot always make people see what ground they have in common, yet it is clear to me that they are the two great intuitive composers as distinguished from the great logical ones. Of course all great composers must have intuition, but most have had to eke theirs out with logic, while intuition hardly ever seems to have failed my two heroes. And it is intuition that I count as the supreme thing in music. Call it heart as against head if you will. In Berlioz, as in Mozart, you are always coming upon a beautiful, fresh-sprung melodic line such as no amount of head-work could have suggested. In Wagner, much as I love his music, I feel sometimes a mechanical process at work which makes me rate him below Berlioz.

'This logic that can go on for ever, though intuition fail, is the source of all the dull, pretentious music of the ancients and of the terrible clevernesses of the moderns. But I think the modern logicians have the better of it, because they are not so preternaturally solemn. Logic if tolerable must tend towards comedy, and such composers as Stravinsky and Ravel (whom I admire greatly) are all that is witty. Save us from the composers who argue solemnly!'

SOME ANTIPATHIES

Mr. Harty's predilections are for symphonic and choral music. Opera for him is an outer court of the temple. 'Opera seems to me a form of art in which clumsy attempts are made at defining the indefinable suggestions of music. Or else one in which the author of a plot and his actors are hampered by music which prolongs their gestures and action to absurdity and obscures the sense of their words. The sound apologia for opera is on the lines that it induces into listening to music many people who are not musical enough to love it for its own sake without the accessories of operatic acting and operatic scenery—such as they are! Is it possible to-day not to see that Wagner deluded himself when he thought he was making a new and supreme harmony out of half a dozen arts? When we hear Wagnerian opera we put up with a lot—for the sake of the music. Who for instance wants actually to see Isolda waving her scarf in signal to Tristan? The music is telling us of that, and also of the fluttering of Isolda's heart. The action here is as superfluous as that objectionable habit of some people at concerts when they start humming on recognizing a favourite theme. Sometimes Wagner's staginess tends to make ridiculous scenes which, left to the music, would be amply significant. Take, for instance, that supper-party in Hunding's hut (first Act of "The Valkyrie"). The music tells us that the two Volsungs are stealing enraptured glances each from other. But the Bayreuth tradition also insists that the actors shall stare transfixedly, and stare they always do in the most aggressive way, though under Hunding's very nose. The apprehensive and throbbing music has told us of their feelings and of Hunding's suspicion. But the behaviour of the actors is always such as more than to confirm any suspicion, and you feel that Hunding would be more than justified in turning the stranger out into the storm straightaway.

'Operatic scenery affects me similarly. The Prelude to Act 3 of "Tristan" has painted the sea so well that it is always a descent to be shown the scenic artist's attempt at it a minute or two later. The subject might be run to earth in those operas where music is at its most grandiose, and the scene precipitates itself from the merely banal into something near the grotesque. The last scene of "The Twilight of the Gods" is a classic example.'

The inquisitive one now feels encouraged to ask further after Mr. Harty's musical antipathies.

'Well, here goes for one of them—the chromaticisms in César Franck. We have all heard of Franck's admirable character, and there are many men of eminence who give to his music, too, the extremest veneration. How are personal predilections to be explained? I confess to finding something weak in Franck's mystical style. Friends of mine there are who can worship Brahms with impartiality through all the length and breadth of his works; and I sometimes find it hard to share all their transports. The Brahms I most sympathise with is what perhaps I may call the Brahms of Resignation—the Brahms of the grey, level serenity of such a work as the "Requiem."

'Scriabin—dare I say it?—is not a composer I wholly believe in. I find it hard to assume his vogue will continue. Meanwhile, so many clever musicians are writing in England that it is strange no English music is being made—I mean music that naturally strikes one as English. It is all the stranger because the English countryside has a nature so much its own, and yet I can think of no music clearly inspired by it—unless, perhaps, some of Dr. Vaughan Williams's earlier work. What is the reason? Do we musicians live too much in towns, or aren't we patriotic enough?

'My ideal at Manchester will be to have no music played simply because it is new—or because old—or because it is familiar or because not, or just because it was composed in England or in Jugo-Slavia, or in the Isle of Man. I hope to arrange programmes based on worth. I do not believe in too great a proportion of a concert being in strange, novel idioms. I hope to have something new at each concert, and also at each a solid proportion of music that can be enjoyed without the learning of a new language every week.

'But before all that happens I am counting on a summer in the country, and a chance to put down on paper some of the music out of my own heart—or head.'

MR. HARTY'S COMPOSITIONS.

The following is a list of Mr. Harty's major works:

'The Mystic Trumpeter.' Baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra (Novello).

'With the Wild Geese.' Symphonic poem (Novello).

'Ode to a Nightingale.' Soprano solo and orchestra (Breitkopf).
 'A Comedy Overture.' Orchestra (Schott).
 Violin Concerto (C. E. Music Publishers' Co., Dublin).
 'Fantasy Scenes.' Orchestra (C. E. Music Publishers' Co., Dublin).
 Pieces for Oboe and Piano (Stainer & Bell).
 'Spring Fancies.' Harp (Novello).
 Songs (Novello. Boosey).

C.

FIRST STEPS IN MUNICIPAL MUSIC

By H. C. COLLES

One day recently Dr. Arthur Somervell boldly tackled the question of municipal orchestras, theatres and opera houses before the Lord Mayor of Liverpool and other municipal authorities of the North; on another Mr. W. H. Kerridge delivered a lecture in London to explain how such institutions are run at Zürich where he was formerly employed as assistant conductor, and glancing at the newspaper I read that a Welsh National Orchestra is actually in process of formation. The last looks like something definite; the lectures may at least be straws which show the direction of the wind. It is something to recall that the Lord Mayor of London himself has said that he looks forward to a time when every village will possess its choral class and its band. Will he and his brother mayors do anything to advance the cause of music in any of these directions? is a question which the musician most naturally asks.

But that question really takes hold of the stick at the wrong end. 'The cause of music,' with which is closely bound up the cause of the musician, the advancement of his art, his profession and his trade, is a matter for musicians, but it is the cause of the community as a whole which municipal authorities are charged to interest themselves in. Rather is it their business to ask whether music plays any appreciative part in the life of the community, and if so what music is best suited to the needs of the average man, woman, and child. When a municipality lays out a recreation ground it parcels off a piece for children under twelve and puts up swings and a seesaw, it plans a good open space for older games, football and cricket, and provides a gravel walk with seats for the elders, decorating its borders with shrubs and flowers. The shrubs and flowers are not put there to encourage horticulture or to give employment to gardeners. They are there because people too old to play football want the recreation of seeing something beautiful as they sit in the sun.

Now the case of music bears a fairly close parallel to the public recreation ground, only that it is not quite so easy to grasp the requirements. Dr. Somervell reminded his hearers at Liverpool that the expenditure of public money on music has begun, because the Education Act provides for the teaching of music in the schools, and the ratepayers therefore have accepted the principle that music is an interest of the community at large and not only of the professed musician. By training that interest at the public expense thousands of people have been made subject to its influence, and all the younger generation is growing up wanting to sing and play and dance or at least to listen to music. Why do all the cinema theatres provide orchestras, many of them highly efficient ones? Simply because the love of music draws a great part of their audiences. People crowd to luncheon-hour concerts, mid-day organ recitals, and every place where they can get music, good, bad, or indifferent. The employees of business firms band themselves into musical societies to sing and play music; you cannot walk down a suburban street without hearing a pianoforte or a gramophone. 'Very well,' the opponent of municipal music may say, 'if they have all got their music and are going so hard at it what more can be wanted?' A great deal more. Where there is no recreation ground the little girls skip on the pavement, the boys kick footballs about the streets, and the old people stick a flower pot in the window and pretend that it is a garden. So the municipal authority says, Let us give them a chance of doing it better, doing it more healthily and getting more happiness out of it, and provides the recreation ground.

In music we have got them to the point of providing one part of the recreation ground—the children's part. When the youngsters have developed their artistic limbs, is there to be nothing but the squalor of musical back streets for them to carry on in? There is precious little at present outside the private enterprise of choirs, choral societies, and amateur bands, which small groups of people initiate for themselves. Those towns which have municipal music—Bournemouth, Brighton, Harrogate, and others—do it chiefly as an attraction to visitors, not primarily to benefit the inhabitants, though the inhabitants do share in the benefit to some extent, and are vastly better off in consequence than the inhabitants of towns which have no ambition to be considered as 'watering places.'

But professional orchestras are not the only way of making municipal music possible. The young men and women who have learnt to sing at school go on singing. They want to make music as well as listen to it, sometimes more than they want to listen to it. They might be given their musical recreation ground in the form of a grant which would pay for a hall to practise in, would buy music, and provide professional teaching. The support of the local choral society or band is the readiest means of providing for their needs. This is a modest demand in comparison with the call for municipal theatres, orchestras, and opera companies all over the country; it is too modest to satisfy the musicians, nor should it satisfy them, but it would be a very practical beginning, and one which could be made without causing a shock to anyone.

At a meeting of the Musical Association some years ago, Mr. James Glover—who, as everyone knows, is a practical man if ever there was one—pointed out that an Act of Parliament was passed in 1907 entitling every borough to charge a penny rate for music. He asked very pertinently why no London musicians had called a meeting to promote the adoption of the Act. One may hazard a guess that the answer to his question was that most London musicians knew nothing about it and the remainder thought it not worth while to bother about it. London musicians, whatever they may say to the contrary, are rather pampered folk, and at about the time of the Act and of Mr. Glover's remarks they were more than usually so and were putting their faith in the goodwill of millionaires. There was little inducement to press for a penny rate through the boroughs. But if they had, and had secured its expenditure on the support of the best existing institutions, music would have got something like a regular endowment which would make all the difference in these lean days when millionaires so resolutely turn away the light of their countenances.

Dr. Somervell estimated the other day that a penny rate in Liverpool would produce £21,000 with which to run a municipal orchestra and subsidise a municipal theatre. A much smaller sum would do the humbler work of supporting and giving a stronger direction to all the tentative efforts of the amateur musicians whose enthusiasm finds vent in choral singing and local bands, and whose efforts are shown at every competitive festival.

Now it may be suggested that this draws a red herring across the trail, that to propose to subsidise music by helping along existing amateur institutions just at the moment when mayors and corporations are apparently prepared to consider the idea of the municipal orchestra and theatre favourably, is to show them too easy a way of escape by doing a little thing instead of a big thing. But that is surely to return to the old way of regarding the situation as though it were a conflict between the few musical specialists on the one hand and the civic authorities on the other, Municipal music like the municipal recreation ground has to be planned to give the greatest scope for the best exercise of the existing tastes of the community. Some of the larger towns are, one hopes, ready to benefit by the symphonic orchestra and the regular performance of opera. Dr. Somervell was perfectly right to urge the Liverpool authorities to think out the subject on a large scale, and to tell them that only a very spacious scheme would be good enough to supply the musical needs of a city of the size and standing of Liverpool. For them a grant here or there to local choirs and amateur bands would be merely trifling. But there are plenty of places where the larger issue of establishing music of the first rank for the benefit of the community does not come into practical politics at all and is not likely to do so for many years to come. That fact, however, does not relieve the municipal authorities of responsibility in the matter. It is still up to them to ask what music is possible, to see what music is made in the place, and how it may be furthered and encouraged. The modest beginning so far from detracting from the greater enterprise is likely to lead to it. The brass band if it does its work well may become an orchestra, the room originally provided for amateur efforts may develop into the municipal concert-hall or theatre. For there is one important difference between municipal music and many other undertakings for the benefit of the people, that from the first the music can make some cash returns. The recreation ground, the free library, the picture gallery, institutions generally accepted as suitable for support from the rates, make no returns. The choir and the band will give concerts for which people pay. The better they are the readier are people to pay and the less the cost to the community. Every good show therefore gives the chance of a better show next time. Musical activity wisely stimulated tends to increase and better its best. It is only when it is neglected or thwarted that it takes a downward course. That is the difficulty but also the joy of music as a social activity. Your library is fitted up, the pictures are hung in your gallery, both remain to be used or not used according to circumstances; they do not change except for the accumulation of dust on the shelves or the picture-frames, or the occasional acquisition of new books or pictures. People read or look and go away; are pleased to discover what they want, or annoyed by not finding it. Their interest is often a passive one and always purely individual. But music discovers their need of one another. It brings the artist and the amateur into personal contact. It demands the co-operation of every social class; it flourishes only on keenest sympathy and discrimination of taste—in a word, it develops the spirit of the community as no other art can.

This has been pointed out over and over again. To say it once more, particularly in the columns of a musical paper, is likely to be largely preaching to the converted. But musicians have taken too little pains for the conversion of unbelievers, and have too constantly urged the case from the point of view of their special interests and to give the impression that they are primarily demanding something for themselves. It is an impression as unjust to themselves as it is to their cause. The greater part of the public music in our smaller towns at the present time exists because of the devotion of professional musicians—organists, teachers and others—who give up their spare time to the social work of training choral societies and giving concerts which are of little or no profit commercially to themselves. Musicians are probably as public spirited a body of men and women as any class in the country. They only want more opportunity for using their talents for the general welfare, and it is these opportunities which the municipal authorities should seek to provide.

BY EDWIN EVANS

IX.—RALPH VAUGHAN WILLIAMS

There is in English life a baneful tendency to convert distinguished personalities into impersonal national institutions, and to value them not so much for what they are, or for what they have accomplished, as for what they represent in the public mind. However flattering this may be, it is always harmful for a man to be turned into a figurehead. There is little doubt that the otherwise inexplicable neglect that overtook some of the works of Elgar's best period must be attributed to the fact that his fame, having received official sanction, had become one of those accepted institutions which the average Englishman takes for granted, and concerning which he therefore has no further curiosity. At the moment of writing, Elgar's second Symphony has just been rediscovered, and a contemporary pathetically inquires why this fine work is not heard as often as Beethoven's C minor Symphony. To my mind the answer is plain: Beethoven is a habit, Elgar an institution. Happily the success of the recent performance seems likely to bring about the doing of tardy justice.

It is because there is some danger of Vaughan Williams being thrust, much against his inclination, into a position possessing some analogy, that I feel impelled to open the discussion of his music in this way. Already he is spoken of as a possible successor to Elgar, as if the function of both were something resembling the chairmanship of a committee. Painters all the world over are well aware that the quickest road to oblivion is the presidentship of an academy. Musicians, generally, have had the good sense to avoid such dangerous captaincies. It is their admirers who are at fault, and those of Vaughan Williams could not do him a worse disservice than to continue to speak and write of him as the prophet who is to lead the 'national' party in English music to the sweets of office. He has no such pretensions. On the contrary, his whole attitude towards music is a protest against leadership and an assertion of independence. Sincere music—and that of Vaughan Williams is nothing if not sincere—is necessarily an expression of personality, and it would be difficult to imagine anything more unlike an official institution than the personality of this unaffectedly natural musician. That he should be held in high esteem by the folk-song enthusiasts is not surprising, for he has supplied them with ammunition in the shape of attractive examples for their interminable polemics. But they take a liberty with his name when they quote him in support of their extreme views, and even more so when they affect to regard him as their standard-bearer. There has been nothing of deliberate intent in his employment of the folk-song idiom. What happened was simply this: early in his musical life he heard some English folk-tunes, and it flashed into his inner consciousness that this was the kind of music he wanted to write. With that simple directness which characterises everything that he does, he sat down and wrote it, or something as much like it as was possible to his somewhat stubborn articulation in those early days. When he came across some tunes that appealed to him so strongly that he thought people ought to hear them, he provided the opportunity by weaving them into a rhapsody, and he has had his reward in the fact that his cherished Norfolk discoveries are now familiar in the concert-room. There was no thought of displaying his musical skill in the manipulation of set thematic material. In fact he has always been so doubtful of his own skill that, to those who know him, the very suggestion of his attempting to display it is an absurdity. Still less was there any intention of illustrating a pet theory, for among his manifold musical interests theories occupy no place. They are foreign to his nature. As a craftsman he is intensely practical, sometimes hampered by a lack of dexterity, but not in the least disposed to turn to theory for assistance. In that, his compositions are an accurate reflection of himself, as they are in many other traits which are easily recognised by those who have the privilege of his acquaintance. Among them is economy of speech. He expresses himself without circumlocution, and seldom speaks unless he has something definite to say. This does not restrict him to brevity in form, as on a great subject there is always much to be said. But he dispenses willingly with what may be called the argumentative resources of music, and rarely troubles to expend much labour upon establishing the connection between successive ideas whose relation to each other is, in his mind, sufficiently clear. This results sometimes in a seeming disjointedness analogous to that of conversation between friends who understand each other too well to be needlessly explicit. The same applies to a certain ungainliness which sometimes affects his musical speech. It is the exact opposite of the carelessness of style which in some composers results from volubility, and it corresponds to the speech of one whose power of thought is not matched by his power of words. Another writer has aptly described his music as 'sane in conception, weighty in utterance, and blunt in expression.' That again proves its intimate relation to his personality, for his outlook upon life is eminently sane and free from cant; the things that interest him are those things which are most worthy of interest, and what he has to say about them is generally blunt and to the point. If the measure of all music is its expressive power, then the music of Vaughan Williams must be accounted great, for it is a perfect expression of the man even in its occasional failure to find polished expression for what is in his mind—which by no means results in failure to make himself understood. Such a man is not fitted to be a figurehead. He would wear the honour with an ill grace.

There is, however, one respect in which Vaughan Williams heads a chapter of English musical history. If the names of English living composers are arranged in the order of the dates of their birth, it will be noticed that a very definite break occurs between those of them who were fated to spend their 'prentice years in the atmosphere of placid mediocrity which was not so very long ago the condition of English music, and those who, at an impressionable period of their careers, found themselves surrounded by the unrest which followed upon that period of stagnation. This break occurs at a point which makes Vaughan Williams chronologically the senior member of the younger generation. The distinction is merely chronological and not musical, for it so happened that Vaughan Williams, like many another composer of strong personality, was somewhat slow in development. The generation which he heads had the rather mixed blessing of a number of precociously voluble talents which gave the first years of its activity a brilliance that has not stood the test of time. These rapid growths overtook Vaughan Williams, and for a time usurped a disproportionate share of attention. It would be an exaggeration to speak of the hare and the tortoise, but in view of these exploits Vaughan Williams's seniority is merely fortuitous.

He was born October 12, 1872, at Down Ampney, in the part of Gloucestershire adjoining the Wiltshire border. His school days were passed at Charterhouse, 1887-90, after which he entered for a two years' course at the Royal College of Music before proceeding to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took the degrees of Mus. Bac. in 1894 and B.A. in 1895. His teachers there were Charles Wood for composition and Alan Gray for the organ. In the autumn of 1895 he returned to the Royal College of Music and continued his studies with Parry and Stanford for composition, Parratt for the organ, Graham P. Moore and Herbert Sharpe for the pianoforte. He left the College in 1896, but not deeming his musical training complete he journeyed to Berlin the following year, and worked at the Akademie der Künste with Max Bruch. After officiating for some time as organist at South Lambeth Church, and giving University Extension Lectures on music at Oxford and in London, he returned to Cambridge in 1901 to proceed to the degree of Mus. Doc. Even then he was not satisfied with the state of proficiency to which he had attained and, as is well known, he went to Paris in 1908 for a further course with Maurice Ravel. It is necessary to give these details in full, as they have a closer relation than is usual to his career as a composer. His musical training has been cosmopolitan in the best sense, and, if he ever possessed any prejudices, which is doubtful, they have been removed by the process of attrition. At the same time his congenital characteristics were so robust that he could study with Max Bruch, a typical German, and Maurice Ravel, a typical Frenchman, with less danger of becoming denationalized than besets and overcomes many young composers in their home study of the German classics or the works of the modern French school. It is a paradoxical comment on our musical tradition that there are still many who believe that a composer who remains obstinately and persistently English, does so of deliberate purpose, as if it were more natural to become foreign. If deliberate purpose enters into the matter at all, it could be laid more justly to the charge of those others, not that they intentionally assume a foreign garb, but that they are more concerned with effect than with motive, and would rather write music which is effective according to the fashion of the day than music which was a true expression of themselves. Dishonesty is too strong a word to apply to their naive self-deception, but nevertheless the factor which has safeguarded Vaughan Williams from all such temptation is his almost ingenuous honesty of motive. He is at all times truly himself because he has not enough artifice to be anybody else, and the gain is indubitably ours. Another point arising from his education is his healthy literary taste, which has a twofold influence. In the first place it guides his selection of texts to be set to music. He is one of the very few composers of whom it may be truthfully said that he has never set a bad poem or even one that was merely innocuous. But apart from that, this fastidious regard for language constantly guides him in his choice of melodic inflection. This point was fully discussed in the Musical Times of June and September, 1918, by Mr. Ernest Newman and myself, who, as sometimes happens, were in disagreement upon it. Disclaiming all desire to resume the argument, I would hazard the suggestion that such infelicities as may be found in Vaughan Williams's vocal lines are due not to a lack of feeling for language but to an occasional difficulty in translating that feeling into notes of music. There is all the difference in the world between what may be described as the instrumental setting of words and that which is genuinely vocal. Those of our composers who make the latter their ideal are largely experimenters, for our tradition in these matters has been interrupted, and there is nothing to guide them in their search for a melodic equivalent of the English language except the music of a remote past with which we are out of touch. It would be unreasonable to expect all experiments to be equally successful, especially in the case of a composer who does not put dexterity in the forefront, either in his aims or in his attainments. But Vaughan Williams attains a high record in this matter, and will surely be reckoned by posterity among those who helped materially to restore the value of English song.

Harmonically there is in reality only one thing to be recorded of Vaughan Williams's music, and all other considerations are subsidiary to it. The modern tendency of harmonic theory is to reduce the number of note combinations which are regarded as independent chords. We are far from the days when we were bothered by the permu tations of the dominant thirteenth, and we are steadily progressing towards a view of harmony in which all compound sonorities are so many disguises of the common chord. The disguise itself is a matter of individual taste. The resources are illimitable. Now, the concept of disguise being in itself foreign to Vaughan-Williams's personality, it is not surprising to find that his disguises are quite peculiarly transparent. There is no fancy dress about them, no attempt to make them appear richer than they are—in short, no false pretence. The effect is quite remarkable. There are composers whose voices sound as if they sang in a thickly carpeted room with plush hangings. The best of Vaughan Williams always sounds as if he were, harmonically speaking, singing in a barn. At the risk of repeating myself I would add that this is another of the circumstances which combine to give so definite an impression of personality as, to continue the simile, the individual quality of a voice is more quickly perceived in a barn than in a drawing room.

The list of his works has undergone considerable revision. Boileau's famous recommendation 'ajoutez quelquefois et souvent effacez' seems to be its guiding principle, as in recent years he has seldom added a new composition to it without removing two or three others, and there is some danger, if his friends do not intervene, that it may ultimately be reduced to a mere handful. An article that I wrote in July, 1903, refers to a number of works which have disappeared, meanwhile, from all authoritative compilations. There is even a composition for pianoforte and orchestra among them, much as it may surprise those who know Vaughan Williams's feeling for the keyboard instrument. A Serenade for small orchestra was performed at Bournemouth in 1901, and about the same time the 'Heroic Elegy' was heard at the Royal College in the original version which was revived five years later. A Quintet for violin, 'cello, clarinet, and horn made its appearance at the Clinton Concerts, and the 'Bucolic Suite' for orchestra, which has since disappeared from the list, had a qualified success the following year. In the above-mentioned article it is described as 'light music, and, as its title implies, pastoral in style; but the principal movements are rather more genuinely reminiscent of the countryside than pastoral music is apt to be. This is not the pastoral music of silk-clad shepherds and shepherdesses, but rather of brawny clodhoppers in corduroys.' It is, however, characteristic that the most noteworthy survivals of this early period are songs, and, moreover, songs which have retained their hold upon the affections both of the composer and of the public. The popular 'Linden Lea' dates from then, and boasts the largest circulation still. 'Blackmore by the Stour' is its contemporary, and the six Sonnets from the 'House of Life,' which followed, include another outstanding success, 'Silent Noon,' though why that song should be more popular than the others is one of those mysteries of taste that no critic yet has been able to solve. The original version of 'Willow-Wood' was performed at the Broadwood Concerts in 1902, and the work was re-written in its present form the following year. Another notable song of those days is 'Whither must I wander'; but 'Claribel' is several years older. So far as output is concerned, it would be inaccurate to regard these years as devoted to vocal writing, for the instrumental works were numerous and important; but whereas only one or two of the latter have escaped the author's ruthless extermination, the vocal works have been more fortunate. This confirms the view that the deep-rooted instincts which dominate Vaughan Williams's work as a whole were independent of the proficiency which he acquired slowly and even laboriously. They gave him fluency at a time when other aspects of music found him, relatively speaking, tongue-tied.

BY HARVEY GRACE

II.—THE WEIMAR PERIOD

One of the earliest of the works written at Weimar was probably the Prelude in G (II., 30). It is of very little value, though not ineffective when played with plenty of pace on a big organ. But as a rule the student who can play it with the necessary brilliance will be wise if he spend his time and technique on something more worth while. It contains very little thematic interest. We are given plenty of scale-passages, sometimes in sixths, alternated with big chords over a conventional zigzag pedal. The writing, laying-out, and management generally show some advance on previous efforts, though here and there Bach does not quite know what to do with the left hand, and ends by giving it some puerile figuration, or a mere duplication of the pedal. Such writing as this, for example:

is very uncomfortable for the young player, and gives poor value for the trouble it involves. The Prelude contains a liberal allowance of double pedal, though only long held notes are used. Spitta says that the chief motive behind this piece 'was the setting free of a tumultuous flood of sound in which the impetuous spirit of the young composer revels with delight.' But it must be confessed that the flood is too frequently dammed to be overwhelming. The occasional bars wherein we suddenly relapse into crotchet movement remind us that a lengthy moto perpetuo was as yet beyond Bach.

We find him getting a bit nearer the mark in the Prelude in A minor (X., 238). Here he sets out to exploit a little rhythmical figure:

and does it so thoroughly that it becomes boring. It is present in all but a very few of the hundred and fifty bars the piece contains, and the interest is too often less than in the passage quoted. For example, we have this very tame sequence:

worked again and again. The leaping pedal is effective—indeed the pedal part altogether is a great improvement on any we have met with so far. It shows us that Bach was beginning to realise the necessity for giving the feet a part as individual and important in its way as that allotted to the hands. He even launches out into a real double pedal passage at the end—not an affair of sustained octaves, but a moving part for the right foot over a stationary left. It is but a short flight, five bars in all, but is an interesting foreshadowing of the dramatic passage at the end of the D major Prelude. This A minor Prelude, like some other early works, is apparently held in far higher esteem than it deserves. I remember one of our most distinguished organists playing it at a recital in Westminster Abbey some years ago. The Abbey was thronged to the doors, the man in the street being present in large numbers. I am afraid he carried away a poor opinion of Bach, as well he might, hearing him thus feebly represented. Even the enthusiastic Spitta admits that 'the effect of the rhythm, continuous throughout, and of the same quietness, is at best, however, somewhat monotonous.' The man in the street probably found an emphatic substitute for Spitta's cautious 'somewhat.' Parry surprises us by describing the work as 'attractive.'

The adjective, however, may fairly be applied to the Fugue in G in $\frac{12}{8}$ time, usually known as the 'Jig' fugue (XII. 55)—very probably composed for a two-manual cembalo, with pedals, a fact which would account for its secular character. Spitta seems to regard it as having been written before the Weimar period, and ascribes it directly to the influence of Buxtehude. Certainly it has a good deal in common with the older composer's Fugue in C major and with the final section of his Fugue in E minor, both of which are in $\frac{12}{8}$ time. But the technique of the Bach work is good enough to warrant the conclusion that the composer had been at Weimar two or three years when it was written. The pedal part alone is, as usual, a pretty safe guide. Here it has the importance and consistency that we expect from the mature Bach. The only signs of inexperience are the episodes, which consist of very poor sequential passages. These may be made fairly tolerable by the use of alternate manuals, thus:

There may be the best of authorities for this treatment, for the manuscript contains piano and forte indications, though whether they were written by Bach or by a later hand is uncertain.

There is a tendency among some strict players to regard echo effects of this kind as modern claptrap. But a moment's reflection will show that they belong to an early period in the development of organ playing. At a date when mechanical aids to registration were few and clumsy, a player who wished to obtain variety would naturally depend a good deal on the antiphony of a couple of well-contrasted manuals. The early French organ composers were specially given to this kind of thing. In the following extract from a 'Dialogue' we find André Raison (1650?-17-?) ringing the changes on four keyboards:

The original directions are 'Grand,' 'Petit,' 'Cornet,' and 'Eco.' With a minim as the unit, and the time allegro, this passage requires neat handling.

If the old Germans were as a rule less enterprising, it was no doubt because their works were almost invariably fugal, or concerned with a chorale, and in both cases rapid manual changes would play but a small part. The early French writers usually wrote short pieces in free form, and set great store by manual contrast and solo stops. But even a fugue could not repress some of them. I cannot resist the temptation to quote a delightful passage from a little three-voice fugue for manuals only by this same Raison :

Ex. 6. Gt. (diap.) Ch. Gt. Ch.

The Choir and Great suggestions are Guilmant's, and represent the 'Dessus de Trompette' and 'Jeu doux' of the original. One does not expect to come upon such a piquant piece of dialogue in the course of a fugue.

On the whole we need never hesitate to play all such episodic passages as Ex. 4 on two manuals. It can hardly be doubted that many of them owe their origin to the possibility of the easy and effective contrast provided by two organ manuals.

As we know, Bach's work at Weimar brought him into contact with a good deal of Italian chamber music, and the 'Jig' fugue probably owes more to the old Italian violin composers than to Buxtehude or any other organ writer. We shall see many traces of this influence a little later. In this particular example it shows itself even more in the form than in the clear-cut springing idiom. The Italians were far ahead of the rest of the world in form, as in most other musical matters. Had Bach not played a good deal of their chamber music he would probably have spoilt the 'Jig' fugue by interpolating some bravura passages after the Buxtehude manner. Despite the weak episodes, this fugue is well worth playing to-day. It demands bright and promptly-speaking stops rather than power, and makes its effect best in a building not too large or resonant. If we think of it as chamber music and treat it accordingly we shall not go far wrong. And if our instrument or technical limitations will not allow us to play it at the lively pace it obviously demands, we should leave it alone. The nearer we can get to $\text{♩} = 100$ the better.

Undignified? Yes, for Bach is frankly at play here. We can no more make this dance-scherzo dignified by playing it slowly than we can make the 'Little E minor' merry and bright by playing it quickly.

Another example of youthful high spirits is the 'Short' G minor fugue (ii.), which clearly dates from this period. It is one of the most popular of all Bach's works, and deservedly so, in spite of the fact that it is a long way from being a first-rate example of the form. Its faults are so obvious as to need only the merest indication. Not many pupils play bars 25-27 without noticing that the entry of the subject in the left hand fizzles out, that the pedal comes in only to play the humble rôle of harmonic support, and that the subject in the right hand apparently begins with its third note. I say 'apparently' because a second glance shows that the entire subject is there, but its first two notes are hidden in the semiquavers. Even Spitta seems to have missed them, for he says the left hand entry 'is transferred after a few notes to the right hand.' If it were a case of transference, the right hand would begin with the fifth note of the subject. Here are the three bars in question :

Ex. 7.

Very little resource is shown in the treatment of the subject throughout. We have practically the same accompanying counterpoint at each appearance, helped out by a third part which does little beyond running in sixths with the counter-subject or hanging on to an inverted dominant pedal. There are less than a dozen bars of four-part harmony in the whole work, and five of these are in an episode; and yet such is the charm of the fugue that we would not exchange it for some of the most formally perfect examples by Bach or anybody else. It has the three essentials of all delightful music—tunefulness, vital rhythm, and spontaneity. No faults of construction can damn a work in which these qualities are prominent, any more than formal perfection can save one in which they are absent. The wise teacher will not fail to point the moral when his pupils are revelling in this fugue—as they always do.

One or two practical points call for notice. Shall we shake on each of the long-held manual notes? Some editions call for a trill in every case except that beginning in bar thirty-five, where it is clearly impossible. Others indicate it only in the two appearances of the long note as the highest part. This seems the sounder plan, as the shake is then fairly easy, and the passages gain a good deal in brilliance. The sustained G in the tenor seventeen bars from the end is better without the shake, because the note is the centre round which the semiquaver pedal passage plays, and a shake obscures the outline. The trill sometimes suggested for the alto of the final bars is also scarcely worth the trouble. After all, we must remember that a long shake was originally little more than a device intended to produce the effect of a sustained note on instruments of the clavessin type, whereon a real sostenuto was impossible. Its use on the organ is purely ornamental, and it rarely makes its full effect save when it stands out at the top.

The fugue calls for bright rather than loud registration, though the full organ may well be used at the end. As the writing is mostly thin and rather high on the keyboard we should be careful to use only the less aggressive of the 4-ft. stops, except in the passage preceding the C minor entry of the subject (where the harmony is in four parts with some low pedal notes), and in the closing bars. The last episode may be played on the Swell or Choir, preferably the former, the Choir sounding rather lifeless after the stirring C minor passage. The return to the Great for ending is a bit of a problem. Dr. Hull suggests this plan:

which is excellent in its bringing out of the imitation, but decidedly risky in execution. On the whole, there is much to be said in favour of staying comfortably on the Great, reducing it to 8-ft. diapasons, and beginning to build up the tone again half-way through the episode. We may increase to full without Great reeds in the bar before the pedal entry, because thereafter we have no spare limbs for registration purposes. Everything else may be added for the final bar and a half.

Endings vary as to the text of the sixth and seventh bars from the end. The Novello version of the left-hand part is:

EX. 9.

The more usual reading is:

EX. 10.

which is certainly more melodious, convenient, and logical.

DELIUS'S NEW OPERA

By PHILIP HESELTINE

'Fennimore and Gerda,'* described on the title-page of the score as 'Two Episodes in the Life of Niels Lyhne, in Eleven Pictures, set to music by Frederick Delius,' was produced for the first time on any stage at Frankfort on October 21, 1919.

All the resources of the famous opera house were lavished upon the production. There were nine full orchestral rehearsals, and performers and public alike seem to have been enthusiastic in praise of the work.

A month later the composer came to London to supervise the revival at Covent Garden of his earlier opera, 'A Village Romeo and Juliet.' Arriving one week before the date fixed for the first performance, he found that no full rehearsals had yet taken place, and that such preparations as had been made for the production were in a state of chaos unilluminated by even the customary British assurance that 'everything would be all right on the night.' He was therefore obliged, in sheer self-defence, to forbid the performance: in consequence of which the public were given two additional opportunities of acquainting themselves with the master-works of Puccini.

These two episodes in the life of Frederick Delius throw an instructive light on the present condition of music in his native country. It is also significant that the gap in the repertory caused by the withdrawal of Delius's opera was filled by further performances of Puccini. For when 'A Village Romeo and Juliet' was first produced here in 1910, it fell rather flat, owing to what the critics were pleased to call 'lack of dramatic interest.' Now supposing one of the later plays of Maeterlinck were presented to the patrons of the Lyceum Theatre, with every conceivable scenic appurtenance and 'effect,' as a thrilling melodrama, they would no doubt pass a similar verdict, couched perhaps in not quite similar terms. So it is inevitable that if a work like 'A Village Romeo and Juliet' is presented as a realistic drama (a minor detail of the 1910 production was a real merry-go-round on the stage!), critics previously unacquainted with the work cannot be blamed for judging it by the 'dramatic' standards established for them by Puccini.

They have of late years grown so accustomed to regard an opera as a play set to music that their sense of what is fit and proper to the form is apt to be very sadly perturbed when they are confronted with a work which is simply the overflowing of music on to the stage, the projection of emotions underlying music into visible as well as audible reality.

Opera, it should be remembered, is a musical form. It is not a play with music, though many such are termed operas or, more accurately, music-dramas. Opera is simply programme music with the programme enacted upon an external stage instead of in the imagination merely: and the scope of its programme may range from the crudest form of melodrama to the subtlest interplay of conflicting emotions.

When a composer is said to be inspired by his subject, it is too often supposed that the subject itself suggested the work to him in the first instance, that he is adumbrating his subject as though it were a thing exterior to himself. In the same way the music of an opera is thought to have been generated by its text.

In some cases this may be true: but in the majority, the subject or programme of a musical composition is no more than a convenient framework upon which the composer may construct and elaborate a work whose emotional or psychic basis was already clearly defined in his mind before he approached his 'subject.' This explains the common phenomenon of a composer who ardently desires to write an opera but cannot find a suitable libretto.

A symphonic work based upon a tale or drama is not an 'illustration' of its subject, tacked on to the finished product like 'incidental' music, but a new presentation, in terms of another art, of the elements of which the original tale or drama was made. Thus the music and the drama are parallel expressions of the same matter. The one is not engendered by the other: their relationship is rather that of brother and sister.

The old distinction between 'operatic' and 'symphonic' music has broken down as completely as the arbitrary differentiation of 'programme' music from 'abstract' or 'absolute' music, which, in a word, is simply music.

Yet all music is necessarily programme music, whether the events that make up the programme are enacted in the visible world or in the innermost recesses of the soul. And even when descriptions of physical phenomena loom large in the programme, these exterior happenings can only assume a musical importance in so far as they symbolise or evoke their corresponding states of mind. Music, in short, may be described as a formula for evoking a particular state of mind or a complexity of such states in a particular relation. These relations which can be generalized and expressed by music could not be even stated in words without the invention of a kind of psychological algebra.

We cannot state an emotional crisis in words, but we can sometimes provide an example of how a particular individual will behave under the stress of such emotion, his words and actions expressing particularly a condition which music would necessarily generalize, however strong the individuality of its composer might be.

Thus in an opera the plot or story may be just an example, a visible particularization of what the music is telling us in a broader and more universal sense.

The music is not illustrative of that particular story: on the contrary, the story is one among many other possible illustrations of the emotional basis of the music which has, after all, its origin in the experience or imagination of the composer. And the listener, being an inverted composer, recognises its truth in correlation to his own experience or imagination. Each character in the story is merely a medium into which the composer projects part of himself and in which the appreciative spectator or listener recognises a part of himself also.

All opera of this kind is either parable or pure symbolism.

In Delius's 'A Village Romeo and Juliet,' although there is an ostensible story, it is impossible to regard the characters as the ordinary individuals of Gottfried Keller's novel. They have become symbolic types that move and have their being in a vision of human life, aloof and mysterious.

In 'Fennimore and Gerda' the characters are not in the least mysterious: they speak and act like ordinary human beings, and 'naturalness' is the keynote of the dialogue. Yet the form of the work has been wholly prescribed by musical considerations, and the libretto—which has been written by the composer himself—is everywhere subordinate to the requirements of the music.

Like 'A Village Romeo and Juliet,' the work is divided, not into acts and scenes but into 'pictures.' In neither opera is the story set forth with any of that narrative detail which has so often been the bane of the lyrical composer, but in both the imagination of the spectator is called into play as an active dramatis persona.

'Fennimore and Gerda' (which was composed between 1908 and 1910) is far more definite and compact in structure than 'A Village Romeo and Juliet,' which dates from 1900-01. Not only are the individual scenes more closely knit in the later opera, but there are greater firmness and coherence in the design of the whole work. Every 'picture' is musically self-subsistent, generally built round an initial theme or rhythmic figure, and the logical development and flow of the music are never interrupted for the sake of thrusting the words into prominence. Nor do comparatively trivial remarks in the dialogue, such as 'Have a cigar, old man,' call for or receive any musical commentary; they fall into their right and natural place in the dialogue by reason of the fact that they are never obtruded by the music. The whole work lasts only an hour and a half. After the second picture and after the ninth picture three years are supposed to elapse, the passage of time being marked by a short interval in performance. After the fourth picture there is a full close but no interval. Except for these breaks the music is continuous throughout, the pictures being connected by orchestral interludes, mostly so short that the antiquated machinery of theatres like Covent Garden could never deal with the changes of scene in the time allotted.

The longest picture (the 'Gerda' episode) occupies fourteen pages of the vocal score, the shortest four, there being eighty-one pages in all.

Without any prelude the curtain rises upon a room in the house of Consul Claudii. Fennimore, his daughter, is working at her embroidery while her cousin, Niels Lyhne, sits at her feet. They are talking about their childhood. Fennimore is impatient at the monotony of her home life and longs to go out into the world in search of new experiences. Niels on the other hand is a dreamer who is well content to remain where he is. 'Your garden window where you sit and sew'—he exclaims—'I want no wider world than this. Out in the world one feels a longing for home, and perhaps one's real home is a kindred spirit whom one loves.' He is on the point of making a passionate declaration to Fennimore when they are interrupted by the appearance of their cousin Erik Regstrup, Niels's bosom friend, in whom Fennimore is obviously more interested than in the dreamy Niels. It begins to rain. Erik calls for a song, and Fennimore unlocks her heart with a romantic ballad:

Young Svanhild sat alone and sighed,
Of freedom and joy despairing.
'Over yonder's the land of my dreams,' she cried,
'And thither I would be faring.' . . .

The curtain descends and, after an entr'acte of twenty-nine bars, rises to reveal the lower end of the Claudi's garden which reaches down to the edge of the fjord. There is a little landing-stage overshadowed by trees, and here Erik and Fennimore are discovered together in a boat. It is night, and the sound of singing is heard from over the water:

A long sustained melody without words for a tenor voice sung 'off.'

Ex. 1.

Hearing the approach of a second boat, Erik and Fennimore disappear into the garden. The other boat arrives, rowed by Niels and containing Consul Claudi, his wife and a friend. They disembark and make for the house, while Niels remains behind to moor the boat. Meanwhile Erik and Fennimore re-appear and Niels quickly conceals himself in the shadow of the trees. A swift love scene ensues (twenty-eight bars in all), built upon two themes (Exx. 2 and 3):

which recur in modified forms throughout the 'Fennimore' episode. The lovers return to the house, and Niels is left alone in despair.

Three years pass. Erik and Fennimore, now married, are living in a house on the Mariagerfjord. Disappointment has come to both of them. Fennimore is disillusioned about her husband, who has taken to drink, Erik about his talent as a painter. He stares moodily at the sea. Fennimore reproaches him for not working any more at his art. He replies that he needs new impressions and new influences. Niels has been invited for a visit, and presently arrives. While Erik is helping the porter to carry in his luggage, Fennimore implores Niels to do all he can to pull Erik out of the slough of despond into which he has fallen. 'Day after day he broods his time away, and when the day is done his horrible friends take him off and keep him drinking all night long.' Erik returns, followed by a maid bearing bottles and glasses. Fennimore leaves the two men to themselves, and there is some semblance of gaiety as they light their cigars and drink to each other's health. The curtain falls, and there is an entr'acte of four bars. The next picture shows the same scene, but late in the evening. The two friends have been talking over old times. Erik speaks of the gradual falling away of all his bright illusions and hopes. 'At times a sense of despair comes over me. I sit and work and nothing comes of it—and time is gliding by with relentless haste. Whenever I paint a picture the time it has taken is mine for ever, although it's past and gone. But think of all the years I've lived and created nothing!' Niels advises him to travel, but this seems only to increase his anxiety. He regards travel as a last resort on which he is afraid to embark for fear of proving to himself once and for all that his career as an artist is at an end.

This is perhaps the most powerful and subtly wrought scene in the whole work. The next picture shows us Erik seated at his easel, morose and listless, unable to accomplish anything. Five of his boon companions, on their way to the fair at Aalborg, invite him to join them. At first he is unwilling. Then one of them—a broken-down schoolmaster—taunts him. 'I see you are much too busy with your immortal painting.' Wearily he consents to go with them. Fennimore begs him to stay at home, but it is useless. 'I must have companionship.' 'But you have Niels: a better friend you'll never find.' 'Niels! He no longer understands me.' Fennimore watches him go, then bursts into tears. Niels comes in, and she composes herself. She asks him what Erik was like as a boy. He speaks of his friend with loyalty and enthusiasm: 'He was all that a boy should be, brave and handsome, a lad of impulse, alert and active, always given to wild pranks and mad adventures.' 'How strange, then,' says Fennimore,

'that he should have wanted to become an artist!' Niels bids her think of him as he was when she first fell in love with him. She replies wearily that she has too often brooded over that time. With a sudden impulse she stretches out her hands to Niels and begs him to stand by her in her trouble. 'You'll be my friend, Niels, always . . . ?' The curtain is lowered for a few bars, and the next picture reveals the same room in the grey twilight of the following morning. Fennimore has been waiting up for Erik, who presently comes in, reeling drunk, and collapses on a sofa. A brief interlude, curiously akin to the slow middle section of 'Brigg Fair,' ushers in the seventh picture: the birch forest in autumn. It is in this scene that Niels and Fennimore first admit the passion that has been slowly springing up between them, and against which each of them has silently struggled in vain. It is a scene of swift movement and a despairing kind of intensity, with something sinister and autumnal in the background all the while, to remind the lovers of the years that are gone and of the brevity and uncertainty of their stolen hours of happiness. The two concluding pictures of the 'Fennimore' episode take place in the depth of winter. The fjord is frozen and the ground is covered with snow. Niels is now living on the other side of the fjord. Erik has gone to Aalborg for the day with his friends, and Fennimore is impatiently awaiting a promised visit from Niels. There is a feeling of tense expectancy in the air. Suddenly the maid brings in a telegram. Erik is dead. He has met with an accident and they are bringing him home. Fennimore, in a frenzy of remorse, rushes out to meet Niels, curses him for betraying his friend and her, and bids him be gone for ever. Four dark figures approach, bearing the body of Erik, and Fennimore falls insensible in the snow. Three years pass. . . . The next picture affords the greatest possible contrast to the three swift scenes preceding it. All is quiet and reposeful. We see Niels on his farm at Lönborggaard in harvest time. The labourers are singing in the fields. Niels reflects upon the past, and finds consolation in having devoted his future to the 'Earth, old and trusty mother of us all.' The happy song of the labourers rounds off this very brief picture.

The last scene of all portrays Niels Lyhne's very sentimental wooing of Gerda Skinnerup, and is enlivened by the merry banter of Gerda's three younger sisters.

Those who are acquainted with Jacobsen's essentially tragic novel* will perhaps cavil at the suggestion conveyed by this ending of the opera that Niels 'lived happily ever after,' for the novel concludes with a powerful and heartrending description of Niels's death in a military hospital after he has been wounded in action.

But Delius's work, as has been emphasised above, is a purely musical conception, and is not designed in any way to illustrate or set forth in detail the life of Niels Lyhne.

The concentration and swiftness of the action and the passionate directness and intensity of the music combine to create a satisfactory sense of unity and cohesion that is all too rare in modern opera. And although this work is already more than ten years old, it is undoubtedly one of the most successful experiments in a new direction that the operatic stage has yet seen.

Interludes

BY 'FESTE'

Some recent happenings in the concert room invite comment. The Editor warns me that space is at a premium this month, so I must be brief. Perhaps I shall be most likely to get in all I want to say if I follow the example of Mr. Alfred Jingle. Those of you who are aged enough to be Pickwickians will remember that volatile individual's habit of covering a great deal of ground in a short time by omitting some of the less important parts of speech. This method will, I believe, be generally adopted at some future date. It will be a very real economy all round, and should appeal to us musicians especially, because in its elision of the unessential it will bring literature into line with modern music. There we are able to dispense with such details as preparation and resolution of discords, or the complete statement and repetition of themes (in the rare event of there being any), and we have no use for cadences except at the end. Sometimes we don't use them even there. We simply leave the musical thought suspended in mid-air, draw a double-bar, and start the manuscript on its adventures among the publishers. In this matter of cadence, literature is already abreast with music. We are now as economical of the full-stop as the modern composer is of its equivalent the cadence. At the head of this page, for example, you will see the title of the journal set forth without the full-stop that a few years ago would have been considered necessary. It is now taken for granted. In due season we shall often find prepositions, conjunctions, and articles omitted on the same principle. The saving of time, paper, and printer's ink will be enormous. We shall then see that Mr. Jingle was not a mere comic character, but a literary artist born a century too soon.

Interesting event of past month débüt of Philharmonic Choir. General chorus of praise—excellently trained, clear enunciation, confident attack, good tone, very. Rather short on the men's side—what choir isn't? Can hardly expect new choir show perfect balance, especially in times when conditions still far from normal. Even in 1913 choral societies did not spring full-armed from sea, like what's-his-name. Comic touch provided by critics who made astute comparisons between balance and volume of four-month-old Philharmonic baby and pre-war standard of long-established Northern choirs. 'Excellent choir, but not a patch on the Sheffield (or Huddersfield, or Leeds, or Birmingham, or Bacup, or Biggleswade, or &c., &c.) heard before the war. Mere Londoners who have never been to Bacup don't know what choral singing is.' And so forth—amusing, very. Only comparison of interest would be with one of Northern choirs when at same tender age. Impossible to make—must wait until Philharmonic is at least six years old—can then fairly pit against Bacup and rest. But method of criticism has piquant possibilities. As thus; piano débutante, Miss Nemo—promising player—excellent touch—unusual intelligence—enjoyable recital—very. But power not a shadow of that produced by Lamond and Busoni at their best. Left hand comparatively weak—development of biceps far below that of village blacksmith—good course Swedish drill needed—can hardly take Miss Nemo seriously as pianist just yet—sorry—very.' Absurd? Quite agree.

Sum up—Kennedy Scott did wonders in getting together and training in such short time choir able give excellent performance of exacting programme—Bach's 'Sing ye,' very difficult eight-part choral section of new Delius work, 'Song of the High Hills,' and Beethoven's Choral Symphony—hardest and most ungrateful of nuts. Perhaps error of judgment in leading off with Bach work—demands very ample resources in tenor and bass departments—weakness of choir unnecessarily exposed—should have chosen four-part or five-part unaccompanied Bach—would have thrilled us with 'Death, I do not fear thee,' for instance—one of finest choruses old man ever wrote. Hope Scott will turn it on soon. Choir showed high musical intelligence in Delius—characteristic idiom—groping chromatics—vague tonality—beauty subtle and elusive; did not elude choir—seized it and passed it on to audience. In Choral Symphony singers very much on spot. Have heard work sung by several crack Northern choirs—very powerful—slightly rough (roughness not out of place here), but never heard better attack or more true and confident singing of cruel soprano passages than by Philharmonic. Hope choir will live long—fulfil early promise—great addition London musical life—fine thing for venerable (but still full of beans) Philharmonic Society—will give opportunities for programmes of exceptional interest. Many vivid works for chorus and orchestra waiting hearing—can be done justice to only by combination of first-rate choir and band heard in building of Queen's Hall size.

Indignant letter in Telegraph few days ago—writer went to concert at Brighton (lucky man to be at Brighton now that April's here!). Beecham Orchestra—conductor, Coates—programme announced Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings—writer anxious hear Elgar work—bought two guineas' worth tickets—(lucky man to have two to spare—wish I knew him!). Went to concert; sat patiently through various works including complete and damning exposure of futility of common chord better known as Prelude to 'Parsifal'—moment for Elgar arrived—writer sat up—woke friends—all agog. No bon, as Army linguists say—Elgar work omitted—no apology or explanation. Writer made appropriate remarks—cooled down—wrote to Telegraph in mild vein suitable to journal circulating in homes of England. Genuine grievance here—of far too frequent occurrence. Concert audiences apparently regarded as worms or doormats—performances begin late—are prolonged by encores which are forbidden (on paper)—end so late that worm whose hole is at a distance has either to crawl off before last item or run risk of meeting early bird before reaching hole.

If I go to variety theatre I know programme will be adhered to, or necessary changes announced—performance will not be held up for ten minutes at a time while some vain soloist trots to and from artists' room lapping up applause till last drop squeezed out—(all soloists, especially vocal, should be smothered—not at birth—too early—must wait till show signs of disease—then adopt method painless as possible—but must be speedy and safe).

Had similar experience to Brighton complainant recently. Went to Queen's Hall to hear Ravel's 'Valse Nobles et Sentimentales'—only work down that I wanted to hear—would have paid to have missed some of rest of programme—gave up afternoon's fishing to go—sat through two hours' waiting for those noble and sentimental waltzes—last item on programme—not played—'Pavane pour une Infante Défunte' substituted—beautiful work, but not what I had paid to hear—annoyed, and felt like one of the worms whose life I had prolonged by not going fishing. Should have been less annoyed if word had been vouchsafed from platform. Conductor, lessee, stewards, and other attendants all afflicted with loss of voice—surely vocal soloist could have come on—made announcement in recitativo. Concert-giving costly work—risky, too—plenty of counter-attractions—cinemas and music-halls with first-rate orchestras—audience allowed to smoke—admission cheaper than at concerts—not right time to irritate patrons by unpunctuality or discourtesy.

Strauss has bobbed up again in concert halls—no wild excitement either before or after performance of 'Don Juan' on March 13—work sounded unexpectedly tame, even at end of a rather tame concert. Some alarums however few days later at Æolian Hall, when M. Mischa-Leon began to fire off programme of German songs in original language. Very disappointing, just when my friend (in fact everybody's friend) Ernest Newman and I had begun to shake hands with ourselves at prospect of embargo on gutturals being removed. War is over—very well—let's be as we were before it began. Can't do without German songs—not enough of any other kind to make up more than a programme or two—as Mr. Newman said recently in Manchester Guardian:

'as yet we have not more than about thirty English songs that have even any pretension to being at once first-rate and English.' True—estimate if anything on generous side, but that is Ernest's lavish, enthusiastic way—I should have put the total at twenty, and of these three are by Purcell and one by Hook—which shows what a poor lot our modern native composers are, as I and my friend remind them at times. German songs thus essential to our musical life—must be sung in German because peculiar beauty of words evades translators—just as we may imagine such equally fine native lyrics as 'Somewhere a voice is calling' or 'The Heart of a Rose' losing some of their poignant beauty if translated into German—Mischa-Leon to be praised for offering feast of song by Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Wolf, &c., unspoiled by being put into our wretched, unsingable language. Distressing to record that group of ill-mannered fellows interrupted singer before he had had time to expel more than dozen of those rich gutturals we have so missed during past five years—I and my friend ashamed of them (the ill-mannered fellows, not the gutturals) hope Mischa-Leon will treat them as deserve by shaking dust of England off feet and taking programme of German songs to quarters where likely to be appreciated—somewhere nearer the Rhine. Got through programme all right after quarter of hour's scene that was disgrace to London. After objectors persuaded to withdraw, settled down and enjoyed ourselves. Overwhelming superiority of German songs shown in first five minutes—Beethoven's 'Adelaide'—lovely poem by Matthison—here is brief extract in English:

Soon, O wonder!
On my tomb will blossom
One small flower from my fond heart's ashes springing.
On its petals one name will brightly glisten,
Can you not guess it?

Can we not? 'Adelaide only,' of course! Music thoroughly worthy—rich harmony—daring and passionate accompaniment. For example:

on its pet-als, on its pet-als one deut lich schimmert, deut lich schimmert auf name will bright-ly glis-ten, je-dem Pur-pur-blätt-chen, &c.

The image shows a musical score for a piano and voice. It consists of three systems of staves. The first system has a vocal line and a piano accompaniment. The second system continues the vocal line and piano accompaniment. The third system shows the vocal line and piano accompaniment, with the word 'Adelaide' written below the vocal line. The piano accompaniment features a prominent bass line with many octaves.

No doubt about that being the stuff to give us. Then had Schubert's song about schoolboy who plucked rose and pricked finger—profound moral lesson on danger of undue haste in pursuit of beauty.

Note thus struck well maintained throughout recital. Why bother us with settings by Vaughan Williams, Ireland, Bridge, Holst, Bax, Parry, Stanford, and others, of reputed poems by Masfield, Yeats, Brooke, Stevenson, &c., when there are the treasures of German lyricism to draw from? Me for Snitzel, Hoggeneheimer & Co. all the time. Must really talk seriously to the youth Capell of Daily Mail—has been saying nasty things about German songs—poking fun at them—disrespectful, very. He must cultivate fine detached attitude of 'internationals'—will then see that Britain is hungry after five years' deprivation of German language and modern German music—has given thorough trial to substitutes from France, Russia, Italy, America, Spain, and even Britain—thought it good enough at first, but soon began to see through it—colourable imitations—inferior Dosset—anxious to get back to genuine article made in Germany by old firm. To-day's motto for musical Britain (if she can be called musical), is 'Back to 1913.'

Hoch!

NEW LIGHT ON EARLY TUDOR COMPOSERS

BY W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD

VII.—RICHARD SAMPSON

Among the many distinguished composers who flourished during the reign of Henry VIII. the name of Richard Sampson holds an honoured place. Dr. Ernest Walker, in his excellent 'History of Music in England' (1907) gives prominence to Sampson in his brief list, but of biographical data he furnishes none save that he was 'Dean of the Chapel Royal in 1516'—an error of date, as will be seen in the course of the present article. No previous musical writer has taken the trouble to piece together the scattered references to this remarkable ecclesiastic and composer to be found in the 'Calendar of Letters and Papers of Henry VIII.,' and I confess it was no easy task to wade through the twenty volumes (in reality thirty-one parts) of that monumental work, on which account the material unearthed will be serviceable to future investigators of early Tudor music.

To begin with, Richard Sampson, LL.D., was not Dean of the Chapel Royal in 1516. This coveted position, which was generally the prelude to a bishopric, was held by John Vesey during 1514-19 (in which latter year he was made Bishop of Exeter), and by John Clark during 1519-23.

One of the earliest references to Sampson is on January 12, 1517, when he was appointed Proctor at Tournay. Three years later he appears as Dean of St. Stephen's, Westminster, and, on April 1, 1522, he was given the canonry of St. Paul's Cathedral, vacant by the death of C. Urswick, to which post was added on June 29 the sacristship of St. Paul's. At length, after the appointment of Dr. John Clark as Bishop of Bath and Wells (March 26, 1523), and his restitution of temporalities (May 2), Richard Sampson was promoted to the Deanery of the Chapel Royal at a salary of £33 6s. 8d. a year.

In the King's Book of Expenses for 1532 we meet with an item under date August 11: 'To Master Dean of the King's Chapel [Dr. Sampson], the ordinary reward for the Chapel, 40s.' Not long afterwards, on March 13, 1533, Dr. Sampson was granted the Prebend of Stotfield in the diocese of Lichfield, and four months later (July 9) he was given the Deanery of Lichfield. He was thus a super-pluralist, enjoying the revenues of Dean of St. Stephen's, Dean of the Chapel Royal, and Dean of Lichfield, as well as Dean of Windsor. Further preferment awaited him, and on March 31, 1534, he was presented to the Rectory of Hackney, but as a sort of set-off he resigned the vicarage of Stepney.

Among the MSS. in the British Museum (Royal ii. and xi.), c. 1520, there is a beautiful Motet for five voices by R. Sampson, 'Quam pulcra es amica'; also a Motet by him, in honour of Henry VIII., entitled 'Psallite felices protecti culmine rose purpuree,' for four voices in parts (Royal ii. and xi.).

Owing to the illness of Dean Pace of St. Paul's, it was found necessary to have a Vice-Dean, and hence on February 20, 1536, Cromwell appointed Sampson 'Coadjutor.' Consequently on Pace's death in May, 1536, we are not surprised to find Sampson advanced to the Deanery of St. Paul's, followed by his promotion to the see of Chichester on June 11, obtaining restitution of the temporalities on July 4. He was subsequently (July 20) dispensed to hold the Deanery of St. Paul's in commendam, having previously resigned the Deanery of Windsor.

Yet although Bishop Sampson owed so much to royal favour, he was a stout partisan of the old faith. On August 21, 1538, he wrote to a dignitary at Rye expressing his aversion to any service sung openly in English, and advising the non-adoption of 'such novelties.' For suspected leanings towards Catholic doctrines he was imprisoned in July, 1540. As Dr. Gairdner writes, 'Sampson, Bishop of Chichester, was one morning nominated as the first Bishop of Westminster; two hours later he was disgraced and imprisoned.' He was, however, soon released and restored to favour, only to be replaced as Dean of the Chapel Royal by Thirlby, the new Bishop of Westminster. As a solatium he was promoted by Henry VIII. to the see of Lichfield and Coventry on March 3, 1543, receiving the temporalities of the same on March 14.

It does not come within the scope of this brief memoir to touch on the career of Sampson as Bishop of Lichfield, but he was one of the six bishops that voted for retaining the old Service books. His musical career practically ended in 1536. There is much obscurity about his religious views under Edward VI., and it is most probable that inwardly he adhered to the old faith. He died at Eccleshall on September 25, 1554, almost eighty years of age.

We are sorry to hear that the British Symphony Orchestra's series of concerts at Queen's Hall is to be discontinued for lack of public support. This unfortunate occurrence should remind concert-givers of the need for decentralisation. At present we have too many concerts in the middle of London, and too few on the outskirts. There is a huge public in the more distant suburbs wanting music, but wanting it near home. Why not take it to them?

A BIT OF OLD LONDON LIFE

As a rule we look to old books and pictures to give us authentic glimpses of past times. Only rarely does music help us, and even then such help is usually indirect. The art was merely groping its way towards expression at a period when writers and painters could set down in unmistakable terms the things they saw. There is, however, one feature of old London life that only music can reconstruct for us. Writers have told us of the street cries: painters have given us pictures of hawkers crying their wares: it is left to the musician to show us the fragments of tunes to which the cries were sung. Few are in use to-day. Like the old signs, they have largely disappeared as the need for them ceased. Some among us who live in what are known as 'select neighbourhoods' even put up minatory notices warning the hawker that if he must needs peddle in 'Our Street,' he must peddle silently. But it is easy to imagine the importance of street cries in days when few of the population could read, and when the retail merchant pushed his shop and stock-in-trade before him on a barrow, or carried it on his head. It is not surprising that old composers should have been interested in these cries: the surprising thing is that only lately have we been able to see the practical result of such interest. As is now well known, Sir Frederick Bridge recently discovered manuscripts of Weekes, Gibbons, and Deering, in which street cries were worked into a kind of choral fantasy, or 'fancy,' as the form was called. Sir Frederick has lectured on his discovery, and our readers will remember that a résumé of one of these lectures appeared in the Musical Times for February. The works have now been published by Messrs. Novello, as Nos. 1343, 1344, and 1345 of their Part-Song Book. The first is by Weelkes, and in its original form was for a single voice with viol accompaniment. Sir Frederick suggests that different voices may be used for the sake of variety, and also to give more point to the various cries. He has made the work suitable for choral performance by arranging three sections for S.A.T.B., adapting the composer's viol harmony. The Gibbons specimen is more elaborate, and consists of a fragment of plainsong given to the third viol, round which the other viols weave counterpoint, while the chorus delivers the various cries, sometimes singly, sometimes in combination. The 'fancy' is in two parts, the first ending with a brief five-part setting of the words, 'And so wee make an end,' the second with the Watchman's cry, 'Twelve o'clocke, looke well to your locke, your fier, and your light, and so good-night.' There is far more scope for choralists than might be imagined, great contrasts in the way of tone-colour being possible. There is a world of difference, for example, between the pathetic begging of the Bedlamites and the strident bass 'Oyez! if any man or woman can tell any tydyns of a gray mare, with a long mane and a short tayle, she halts downe right before, and is starke lame behind, and was lost this thirtieth day of February. He that can tell any tydyns of her let him come to the Cryer and he shall have well for his hier.' The song 'Swepe, chimney swepe' is a delightful tune of sixteen bars.

Good as is the Gibbons 'fancy,' that of Deering is even better. It contains a good many cries not used by Weelkes and Gibbons, and the purely musical interest is perhaps greater. The chimney sweep's song is here given to soprano and tenor, a reminder that the sweep was always accompanied by a small boy. The grey mare is again cried, though in this case she is far more afflicted, being blind, minus one leg, and 'with a great hole in her ear.' In those days, apparently, sufferers from toothache did not pay a visit to the dentist, nor was the practitioner dignified by such a title. There was only one cure, and that was drastic: no such compromises as 'stopping.' The victim waited till he heard the cry 'Touch and goe! Touch and goe! Ha'ye work for Kindheart the toothdrawer? Touch and goe! Touch and goe!'—on which (unless the pain mysteriously ceased) he went and was touched—and touched to some purpose, we may be sure, in spite of the artist's ingratiating name.

It will be seen that these 'fancies' have more than a merely antiquarian interest. They are genuine slices of life, grave and gay by turn, and thoroughly characteristic of our race in their blending of the serious and the nonsensical. There can be no doubt that singers and audiences will revel in them.

THE IDEAS OF M. VINCENT D'INDY

BY C. SAINT-SAËNS, DE L'INSTITUT

(Authorised translation by Fred Rothwell)

II.

In the introduction of his book, M. D'Indy says the most excellent things about the artistic conscience, the necessity of acquiring talent as the result of hard work, and of not relying solely on one's natural endowments. Horace had said the same things long ago; still, they cannot be repeated too often at a time like the present, when so many artists reject all rules and restrictions, declare that they mean 'to be laws unto themselves,' and reply to the most justifiable criticisms by the one peremptory argument that they 'will do as they please.' Assuredly, art is the home of freedom, but freedom is not anarchy, and it is anarchy that is now fashionable both in literature and in the arts. Why do poets not see that, in throwing down the barriers, they merely give free access to mediocrities, and that their vaunted progress is but a reversion to primitive barbarism?

It is no longer necessary to know how to draw or to paint; things absolutely devoid of form—I dare not call them works—find admirers everywhere. Architecture attempted to follow this trend, but as houses must stand upright, and as they must be habitable, it had to call a halt along this particular path of folly. The other arts, finding nothing to hinder them, plunged forward in thoughtless delirium.

Fétis had foreseen the coming of the 'omnibonic' system. 'Beyond that,' he said, 'I see nothing further.' He could not predict the birth of cacophony, of a mere charivari.

Berlioz speaks somewhere of atrocious modulations which introduce a new key in one section of the orchestra while another section is playing in the old one. At the present time as many as three different tonalities can be heard simultaneously.

Everything is relative, we are told. That is true, though only within certain limits which cannot be overstepped. After a severe frost, a temperature of twelve degrees above zero seems stiflingly hot; on returning from the tropics, you shiver with cold at eighteen degrees above zero. There comes a limit, however, beyond which both cold and heat disorganise the tissues and render life impossible.

The dissonance of yesterday, we are also told, will be the consonance of to-morrow; one can grow accustomed to anything. Still, there are such things in life as bad habits, and those who get accustomed to crime, come to an evil end. . . .

It is impossible for me to regard scorn of all rules as being equivalent to progress, by which word we generally mean improvement. The true meaning of the word—progressus—is a going forward, but the end or object is not stated. There is such a thing as the progress of a disease, and this is anything but improvement.

The more civilization advances, the more the artistic sense seems to decline: a grave symptom. We have already said that art came into existence on the day when man, instead of being solely preoccupied with the utility of an object, began to concern himself with its form.

More and more at the present time does attention to utility assume the foremost place; we do away with all adornment and trouble ourselves nothing about form. The need to know is being substituted for the need to believe and to admire; and since what we know is insignificant compared with what we do not know, there is an immense field open to the human intellect. Nothing will ever again check the march of science, though this latter is deadly to faith and art. Faith defends itself with all its might, and it is able to make a prolonged defence; but what can art do? It languishes and dies wherever our civilization spreads its tentacles. No longer is it a necessity for us; it is a luxury that appeals only to the élite. Even the beauties of nature are attacked; animal species are massacred and disappear for ever; age-long forests are destroyed, never to be restored. The same thing happens to cataracts and waterfalls; nowadays we think of them as merely so much motor-power.

In dividing music into its three essential parts, rhythm, melody and harmony, M. D'Indy very judiciously accords the first place to rhythm. Let us therefore see what interpretation he puts on it.

What sets me at ease in discussing the ideas of M. D'Indy is the fact that, as he himself confesses, these ideas are very frequently not his own at all, but rather those of Hugo Riemann, a German.

Here we have an instance of the practice so often indulged in before the war—and not in music alone—of crossing the Rhine in our search after truth. Thus also Combarieu endeavoured to instil into our minds the wild and senseless ideas of Westphal, who wished to apply the principles of Greek scansion to the execution of the works of Bach, Beethoven, &c., which are in no way connected therewith. M. D'Indy gives us elaborate notes on Riemann, Hauptmann, Helmholtz, von Öttingen. . . .

When we hear successive sounds of equal duration like those of the metronome, one of the two has more intensity than the other; we can at will, M. D'Indy tells us, attribute to the more intense sound the odd numbers:

1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

or the even numbers:

1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

'The possibility we have of choosing by a mere effort of will one or the other of these inequalities, clearly proves that rhythm proceeds not from the sounds themselves but from a necessity of our own mind. . . .'

This is not the case; we are not able to choose. We may do so by a momentary effort, but that is unnatural; and if the rhythm is prolonged, nature resumes her rights and the more intense sound is seen to belong to the odd numbers.

Robert Schumann, whose reason was not very clear—it is well-known that he died insane—took into consideration only his own will when he neglected the requirements of nature; along these lines he committed the greatest of errors.

One of his most characteristic aberrations is in the Scherzo of his famous Quintet:

Anyone not acquainted with this piece by actually reading the notes, but only by ear, hears it as follows:

The idea, as conceived by the author, is original and vivid; the result, to the uninformed listener, is a platitude. But what does that matter? It is Schumann, and so admiration is forthcoming all the same.

According to M. D'Indy, measure would appear to be the enemy of rhythm, 'and it is not unreasonable to think that, untrammelled in the future as it was in the past, rhythm will again hold sovereign sway over music, and free it from the servitude in which it has been kept, for nearly three centuries, by the usurping and depressing domination of misunderstood measure.'

Hitherto, however, it had seemed as though the invention of measure had been a step in advance. I appeal for confirmation of this view to all who have undertaken the task of deciphering old manuscripts of music, from which the measure bar was absent. Did it not create syncopation? Has it ever prevented the emphasis or accent from falling where it pleased? M. D'Indy claims that the first beat of the bar is more frequently than not a rhythmically feeble beat. I have not noticed this, but rather the contrary, I imagine. It would, however, prove that measure does not follow rhythm. Shall we have to return to the time when measure was not indicated? Certain bold innovators have attempted this, though without success. In the music of the Middle Ages, of which M. D'Indy gives instances and which are referred to under the name of plain-song, created before the barbaric invention of measure, I look in vain for rhythm; it is only absence of rhythm that I find.

Perhaps it is the same with rhythm as with so many things about which it is impossible to come to an understanding, because different meanings are given to the same word

Let us pass on to melody.

In all melody, M. D'Indy (or is it Riemann?) assures us, there is a preparation, designated, I know not why, by the Greek word anacrusis.

Ah! qu'en termes galants ces choses-là sont dites!

How often have I made an anacrusis without knowing it, as M. Jourdain made prose!

In the Adagio of Beethoven's fifth Symphony, where we have the theme:

the first two notes are, I suppose an anacrusis. The amazing thing is that sometimes, when there is no anacrusis, it is taken for granted as existing.

Sufficient for the anacrusis when the phrase begins on a feeble beat. But what are we to say of the following way of presenting the famous phrase of the ninth Symphony?:

The first bar, then, is nothing more than a preparation, and the melody really begins only at the second bar!

Do not the first and the third bars belong to the tonic, the second and the fourth to the dominant? When the tonic and the dominant are both present, is it not to the former that importance is attached? My entire musical sense rebels against the contrary interpretation, which seems to me a grave fault of style.

It is far worse in the first phrase of the Pastoral Symphony, which M. D'Indy presents thus:

and he remarks that this passage is generally 'interpreted with the most erroneous accentuation it is possible to give it, as follows:

a deplorable result of the tyranny of the measure-bar and of the antirhythmical teaching of the solfeggio.'

Now, this is how Beethoven wrote the theme:

The two detached notes, B and D, an indication which M. D'Indy has changed into a tie that extends right to the following C, naturally carry the accent on to this C. Consequently this interpretation is not the 'most erroneous possible'; it is the very one intended by the composer. Beethoven could not foresee the theories of M. Riemann and arrange his music in accordance with these principles. Is that a matter for regret?

I will not follow the author in his learned dissertations on plain-song, not considering myself competent in this direction, although I have had a great deal to do with plain-song during my long career as an organist. I will simply mention the comparison that is made—an original though very specious one—between the vocalisations of plain-song with those fine ornamental capitals seen in missals, and the same vocalisations characterized by demisemi-quavers which conclude an organ piece by Sebastian Bach.

In the passage cited from this latter, I note an error that surprises me in so conscientious a writer as M. D'Indy: a poco ritenuto which the composer had not indicated. Throughout the entire 'Course of Musical Composition' we find these superfluous indications, unnecessary ties, and added nuances. The system of the perpetual legato did not exist at the time of Bach; the clavecin was incapable of expressing nuances, as also was the organ previous to the modern swell. This was not the case with other instruments or with the human voice, but the probable reason why nuances were not indicated is that they were not of the same importance as they are at the present time, when the nuance frequently forms an integral part of the idea; they were left to the whim of the performer. Why therefore impose arbitrary nuances on the artless reader, who naturally attributes them to the composer? This system, far too prevalent, whilst deserving of criticism in a serious edition, has nothing to do with a 'Course of Composition.' One may well wonder why M. D'Indy, instead of taking his quotations from the Peters Edition, which is concerned but slightly with the question of authenticity, did not have recourse to the magnificent edition of the Bachgesellschaft, which does not contain a single detail that is not true to the composer's manuscripts.

The arrangements for the first Congress of the British Music Society are now practically complete. The time-table appears in our advertisement columns, page 220. We have now received particulars of some of the music to be performed. The London Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Albert Coates, will play Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Cortège des Nobles,' Vaughan Williams's 'London Symphony,' Berlioz's 'Summer Nights' (soloist, Miss Agnes Nicholls), and Strauss's 'Heldenleben.' The inclusion of the foreign items, especially the last-named, may astonish some people, but we may remind them that the Society does not exist for the furthering of British music by the easy process of excluding that of Germany or any other land. The Society is doing good work for our own music by insisting on its fair representation side by side with the best of that from abroad. The all-British programme, save in exceptional circumstances, is a tactical mistake because it implies that our composers can make a good show only when they have the field to themselves. The best compliment we can pay them is to show our confidence in their ability to hold their own in the best of company. We need have no fear for the future if we prevent a return to the 'dumping' methods from which we have suffered so much in the past. The British Music Society does well to make its position clear in its choice of music for the Congress. Our composers have their best show in the choral side of the programmes, as is natural. The Holme Valley Male Choir will sing nine part-songs by Elgar, Holst, Bantock, Coleridge-Taylor, and Walford Davies. Native works at the Chamber Concerts will be Elgar's Sonata for violin and pianoforte (Sammons and Murdoch), and Ireland's Rhapsody, Baines's 'Paradise Gardens,' and Frank Bridge's 'Fireflies,' for pianoforte (Murdoch). Mr. Gervase Elwes will give an English song recital, and the London and Philharmonic String Quartets will play native works. At Westminster and Southwark Cathedrals some fine old English music will be sung, and at the latter a short recital of modern English organ music will be given. The whole scheme, both in regard to meetings and concerts, is striking in the amount of ground covered, and the Society deserves congratulations on this further example of the vigour and enterprise which have been so conspicuous in the short period of its existence. We hope the Congress will have the great success it deserves.

Musical reconstruction is progressing apace in Germany. One of the organs of the new movement is a fortnightly paper called Melos, of which the first number is before us. Its drastic methods are explained in a portentous editorial which tells us that 'Tonality is dead.' The writer uses the martial metaphor of 'Durchbrechung'—all the 'pseudo-architectonic forms of the tonality-epoch must abide our question,' he says. The only hope of the art is in the study of 'pretonal and atonal phenomena'—that is to say, of music as it existed before the major and minor scales, and as it is likely to exist after the process of 'Tonalitätsdurchbrechung' is complete. This study is not such a simple thing as may appear. It can only be carried out by devout souls united in humble and loving realisation of Truth—and aloof from the world. Only to such can the 'Melos' be revealed, which is the inner law, 'Becoming and Being under the rule of its own might.' We have heard all this, or something very like it, before. Many well-known writers and musicians are on the staff of Melos, and some of them write much as they used to write before 1914 in spite of the very futurist design on the title-page.

In our correspondence columns appears a letter from Mr. F. A. Hadland, suggesting that practical steps be taken towards the more frequent performance of Purcell's works, especially the operas. So much interest is now taken in Purcell, that the moment seems opportune for the formation of a society with this end in view. Better still, perhaps the Purcell Society could call in a few dramatic enthusiasts, and extend its operations. Now that its work as an editing and publishing body is practically finished, it could not do better than add the coping-stone by taking a lead in the direction of making Purcell once more a popular composer. At present, outside church music circles he is little more than a mere item in the musical dictionary. The extraordinary success of the 'Fairy Queen' at Cambridge is proof that, given a fair chance, there is no old composer more alive.

We congratulate Mr. W. G. Whittaker on being made an Officier d'Académie by the French Government. Mr. T. J. Gueritte, the honorary secretary of the Société des Concerts Français, in his letter to us announcing the above, says that 'Mr. Whittaker has succeeded during the past fifteen years in making Newcastle so important a centre of study of French music, that French musicians conversant with British conditions doubt whether any other town, even in France, may be found in which French music is so well-known in its most intimate developments.'

The League of Arts, as a preliminary to its projected revival of Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas,' and other works in London parks, is giving four performances of 'Everyman' at King George's Hall, Central Y.M.C.A., Tottenham Court Road, on March 29, 30, 31, and April 1, under the direction of Mr. Patrick Kirwan.

Opinions differ as to the Barrie part of 'The Truth about the Russian Ballet,' but the success of Mr. Arnold Bax's music is emphatic. We understand that the selection of composer was placed in the hands of Mr. Edwin Evans, who promptly chose Mr. Bax, and a good choice too.

The King has been graciously pleased to accept the Gold Medal of the Musicians' Company. The presentation was made at Buckingham Palace, on March 23, by the Lord Mayor, Sir Edward E. Cooper, who was accompanied by Mr. Hugh Wyatt, Deputy-Master; Mr. H. T. C. de Lafontaine, Senior Warden; Major A. C. Chamier, Acting Junior Warden; Mr. W. P. Fuller, Treasurer; Past-Master Sir Homewood Crawford; Past-Master Sir Frederick Bridge; Past-Master C. D. Hoblyn; and the Clerk, Mr. T. C. Fenwick.

The Musicians' Company recently made the unanimous decision to present the Honorary Freedom of the Company to the Lady Mayoress. The ceremony is to be held at the Mansion House on April 27, when the Court of the Company and their ladies will be entertained by the Lord Mayor.

From the Musical Times of March 1 :

It was evident at the outset that the singer was a man of catholic tastes. . . . His programme did more than cover a wild field.

We hope he went one better, like Orpheus, and tamed it.

A 'PARSIFAL' SELECTION.

The Prelude, Transformation Music, and Grail Scene of 'Parsifal' are so frequently performed alone that their publication in handy form should be welcome. Messrs. Novello have just issued these portions of the opera in their Octavo edition. The selection may be performed by choir and orchestra if no solo voices are available, cuts for the purpose being indicated. The extracts are taken from the recently published Novello edition of 'Parsifal,' the pianoforte score and English text of which have called forth so many expressions of approval.

London Concerts

BY ALFRED KALISCH

The most noteworthy thing that has happened since my last chronicle appeared has been the return to Queen's Hall of orchestral music by living German composers. On March 6 Sir Henry Wood conducted Strauss's 'Don Juan' at a Queen's Hall Symphony Concert; on March 16 Mr. Adrian Boult conducted 'Tod und Verklärung.' In both cases Strauss was at the end of a long programme and a few people walked out. How far this was due to patriotism, or a longing for tea, or the need for catching a last train, it is impossible to say. The audiences were enthusiastic. Strauss wears well. The end of 'Tod und Verklärung' perhaps shows the effects of time more than anything, but still it remains impressive. Once somebody expressed the opinion that it was not heroic, and Strauss said that the man whose death was depicted was not meant to be a hero—rather the reverse. The big horn theme in

'Don Juan' still remains one of the full-blooded things in the music of our day.

Things did not pass off quite so uneventfully when at Æolian Hall on Saturday, March 13, M. Mischa-Leon sang a whole programme of German songs—Beethoven, Löwe, Schubert, Schumann, and Hugo Wolf—in German. After a somewhat noisy quarter of an hour which ended in the quiet departure of about half-a-dozen objectors, the concert proceeded in peace, and the audience was extremely enthusiastic. It is to be hoped that there will now be an end of heated controversy on the subject. If a sufficient number of people want German songs to make it worth singers' while to sing them, they will be sung. If those who object are the stronger party, and stay away, they will not be sung. Let us remember that many soldiers who have fought have no objection to German music in general or German songs in particular; and that many whose musical judgment is sound and whose artistic sensibilities are keen do object. It is no less absurd for the one section to shout 'Traitor' than for the other to cry 'Philistine.'

First performances of several new orchestral works have to be chronicled.

At the Queen's Hall Symphony Concert on February 21, Mr. Granville Bantock conducted his new orchestral piece, the 'Sea Reivers.' It is a very vigorous, rough and ready sort of work conveying the impression of having been composed at top speed in the teeth of a strong North-Easter. No completer contrast can be imagined than Mr. Delius's Double Concerto for violin and violoncello, produced at the same concert, which seems to have been conceived and executed in the closely guarded aloofness of a conservatory in the South. It is a very delicately and carefully wrought composition in the composer's typically meditative and languorous mood, and its performance by Miss May and Miss Bertrice Harrison leaves no room for adverse criticism.

Mr. Delius was the hero, too, of the Philharmonic Concert on February 26, when the new Philharmonic Choir, organized by Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott, sang for the first time his 'Song of the High Hills,' which is a record of the composer's impressions of Norwegian mountain solitudes on a balmy summer night. For a brief moment the voice of Man intrudes, but grows fainter and fainter. A part of the work is in Delius's usual vein, but in the choral numbers he displays an amount of vigour unusual with him, and there is an unaccompanied section culminating in a massive climax which will probably be judged in future to be the strongest music he has ever composed. An interesting point about the work is that the chorus sings no words, but only varying vowel sounds. In the ninth Symphony of Beethoven, and Bach's Motet, 'Sing ye to the Lord,' the new choir showed that it has the makings of a body of voices that may in the not too far future venture to compare with a really high-class North Country choir, although it has yet a long way to go.

Mr. Albert Coates conducted the ninth Symphony, and while there was a little lack of massive strength in the first movement, the performance of the Scherzo will rank amongst the finest in London for many a year by reason of its irresistible rhythmical impulse and gaiety. The choral portion had not been sung in London since the war, and it was interesting to note that the opinion held some years ago by a minority that though it is great, it is amongst Beethoven's great failures, was on this occasion apparently that of the majority. ;

The last rehearsal of the Patron's Fund of the Royal College of Music produced two excellent works: the first the very fresh Fantaisie-Overture by Mr. W. McNaught, the other a Symphonic Poem by Mr. H. Collingwood which disclosed unusual ease and resourcefulness in the handling of orchestral masses. Both ought to be heard again, when there will be opportunities for more detailed criticism.

Brief mention should be made of the revival at the Queen's Hall Symphony Concert on March 6 of Mr. George Dyson's 'Siena,' a work that attracted a good deal of attention when first heard about ten years ago. But one would have preferred to hear a later work from the same pen. At the last London Symphony Orchestra's concert, on March 8, the principal feature was Scriabin's 'Prometheus,' remembered by most people because Sir Henry Wood on one occasion played it twice at the same concert on the ground of its unintelligibility. It seemed more intelligible this time, but not more impressive—indeed, the general opinion even of Scriabin's admirers is that it is not the equal of the 'Poème de L'Extase' either in wealth of colour or expressive power. The composer's dogma appears to have hampered rather than stimulated his imaginative powers. He had become its servant instead of its master.

ELGAR'S SECOND SYMPHONY

Mr. Adrian Boult has for some time been marked as a coming man. The polished yet vital performance of Elgar's second Symphony which he conducted at Mr. Dushkin's concert on March 8 justified one in saying that he has arrived. It made one wonder why the Symphony had been neglected for so long, and the enthusiasm which it evoked showed the surprise to be justified.

It is regrettable that the series of concerts of the British Symphony Orchestra had to be abandoned owing to lack of support. At the last concert on February 23, the players gave an excellent performance of Hubert Bath's Symphonic Poem 'The Vision of Hannele,' perhaps the best of his more ambitious works.

The orchestral concerts of the past month have been so very much more interesting than the others, that I may be forgiven for devoting a disproportionately large amount of space to them.

Among the new chamber works produced recently, the Violin Sonata of Miss Ruby Holland deserves mention as showing considerable but as yet undeveloped gifts. It was produced at one of the London Chamber Concert Society's concerts at Wigmore Hall, and at another concert of the same organization we heard again Miss Katherine Eggar's Pianoforte Quintet, which should be played more frequently. Yet another of these concerts was notable for the fine performance of Bach's 'Chaconne' by Miss Jelly d'Aranyi. A few excessive accents in the opening bars would have caused consternation to her distinguished relative, Joseph Joachim, but in other respects the performance was worthy of his pupil.

THE VIOLINISTS AND SINGERS

To continue with the violinists. Mr. Dushkin, whose concert was conducted by Mr. Boult, as mentioned above, is a violinist of refined taste and a charming sense of rhythm. His playing of the E major Concerto of Bach was both classical and human, and he introduced an 'Etude Symphonique' of Blair Fairchild—Debussy seen through American spectacles. Miss Nanette Evans, Mr. Joseph Colman, and Mr. Louis Godowsky, are three young violinists who are progressing in the right way, and Miss Joan Willis is an artistic 'cellist of whom more should be heard in the future.

Among vocal recitals, the most noteworthy has been Mr. John Coates's concert of English song at Central Hall, Westminster, which unfortunately clashed with M. Mischa-Leon's recital at Æolian Hall and made it impossible for me to be present. Further hearing confirmed the excellent impression made by Mr. Douglas Marshall. There was much to praise in the sincere art of Miss Ursula Greville. Mr. Roger Gaillard is a tenor whose very careful attention to technique interferes occasionally with his freedom of expression; but he should develop into a singer above the average. A notable improvement has been made by Mr. Mirsky, who has succeeded in imbuing his interpretations with some of the vigour which they lacked at his first recital. Mr. Wright Symons, who made his mark when appearing in 'Monsieur Beaucaire,' has also given a vocal recital, and proved himself a more than capable singer. His stage experience considerably helped him, but there were moments when it would have been an advantage if he had been able to forget it.

Of pianists there is not much to say this month. Mr. Howard-Jones has, however, re-established his claim to a high position among native artists, and of the British works which he played, the new Fugue and Bacchanale by Harry Farjeon distinctly 'made good.' Mr. Arthur Shattuck, the American pianist, who made his reappearance after a long interval, has developed into a serious artist of fully-matured technical powers. He plays with individuality, without eccentricity.

APPLEBY MATTHEWS

Mr. Appleby Matthews, conductor of the Birmingham City Police Band and of the new Permanent Orchestra of the same town, has risen very quickly to prominence in the conducting world. About four years ago his only opportunity of conducting an orchestra was in cantata and oratorio performances, and in the small orchestral items which sometimes find a place in programmes that are mainly choral.

I think it was in 1916 when I first heard an orchestral number played to the beat of this young musician. The piece was the 'Serenade' of Mozart. The orchestra was a casual gathering of players, and the performance was naturally not particularly striking. Yet it had individuality, and made one imagine that the conductor, already quite famous as an interpreter of choral writing, had in him probably equal powers in this department of music.

By 1919 Mr. Matthews had conducted at a Sunday Orchestral Concert in the promising Beecham scheme of three years ago, had conducted a Promenade Concert at Manchester, had given a concert at Queen's Hall (in the course of which Lamond played the Tchaikovsky Pianoforte Concerto), had wonderfully developed the Birmingham Police Band, and had succeeded in establishing weekly orchestral concerts at Birmingham of such importance that at the concluding (which was about the thirty-fifth) concert of the first series he was able to include in the programme, and to perform in most satisfying manner, the 'Dante' of Bantock and Elgar's first Symphony.

Such a rise is indeed phenomenal, particularly when effected by sheer pluck and pertinacity and without the slightest outside help—indeed, effected despite many hindrances and inconveniences (financial and artistic) and in the midst of busy teaching and concert preoccupations.

Perhaps, however, it is not altogether correct to say that Mr. Matthews effected his rise without any outside help whatsoever, for from the start he had the enormous support of Mr. Ernest Newman, whose faith in him never faltered, and who week after week made very clear that in Mr. Matthews the country had a conductor of potential greatness.

Mr. Matthews is entirely a Midland product. He was born at Tamworth in 1884, and from the age of ten onwards has in the Midland districts studied music, taught, given concerts, worked as Church musician, organized choirs and societies and the like, all with a striking intensity and consistency. He became a pupil of the Midland Institute (under Mr. J. D. Davis) in 1902.

His career is best outlined by a list of his various appointments and public activities:

- 1896. Organist of the Roman Catholic Church, Alcester.
- 1898. Founder and conductor of the Studley Choral Society.

- 1900. } Organist and choirmaster of the Astwood
- 1906. } Bank Baptist Church.
- 1900. } Annual Concerts at Redditch, Alcester, &c.
- 1906. } Organist and choirmaster of Oldbury Parish
- 1911. } Church. Founder and conductor of the
- 1907. } Oldbury Male-voice Choir.
- 1919. } Professor of Pianoforte at Westhouse School,
- 1907. } Edgbaston.
- 1914. } Assistant-organist at Birmingham Cathedral.
- 1910. } Lecturer in Music at the Saltley Training
- 1911. } College.
- 1920. } Organist and choirmaster at St. Agnes'
- 1912. } Church, Moseley.
- 1914. } Conductor of the Midland Institute Students'
- 1912. } Choir.
- 1915. } Conductor of the Birmingham Select Choir
- 1917. } and Madrigal Society (afterwards the
- 1917. } Appleby Matthews Choir).
- 1918. } Yearly performances (six performances during
- 1918. } Holy Week) of the 'St. Matthew' Passion.
- 1917. } Local chorusmaster, Beecham Opera
- 1917. } Company. Three days Elgar Festival at
- 1918. } Birmingham Town Hall.
- 1918. } Weekly concerts at Birmingham Repertory
- 1918. } Theatre.
- 1918. } Professor of Pianoforte, Midland Institute;
- 1919. } conductor, City Police Band.
- 1918. } Sunday Orchestral Concerts, Scala Theatre.
- 1919. } Founder and conductor of the Peace Pageant
- 1919. } Choir (from which a number of singers
- 1919. } were selected to form with the Appleby
- 1919. } Matthews Choir the present 'large' choir).

1919. } Sunday Orchestral Concerts, Futurist Theatre.
 1920. } Conductor of the Walsall Philharmonic Society.
 1920. Conductor of the Birmingham Permanent Orchestra.

In addition to the above, Mr. Matthews has given many organ recitals, a number of pianoforte recitals, produced in very individual style a number of the established oratorios, and done a large amount of accompanying at concerts.

His interests and ideas are the reverse of academic, and his great ambition is to advance music as an entirely popular art. He considers that the 'people' will take the best music, and prefer it, if musicians will but select it judiciously and make it live in performance.

Opera in London

By FRANCIS E. BARRETT

COVENT GARDEN AND SURREY THEATRE SEASON THE REVIVAL OF GERMAN OPERA

With opera North of the Thames and opera South of it, there has been plenty to hold the attention during the month. Both seasons have been in English; and both, apparently, have had their special object. The remarkable feature is that both the undertakings—the Sir Thomas Beecham Opera Company, Ltd., at Covent Garden, and the Fairbairn-Miln Opera Company at the Surrey Theatre—have relied largely upon German opera for attracting their patrons. All that has been said and done in the last few years seems to have made no difference to conservative England. Though the fact seems strange at first, yet it cannot be forgotten that after all it is upon German music that this country has subsisted for practically a whole century. There is a good deal of talk, and some noise, on the subject of German music at the present time; but many seem to forget that we have had it all along. Certainly during the war there was no hesitation about presenting Wagner's 'Tristan and Isolde' as an attraction at Drury Lane, even though, with exquisite irony, the composer's countrymen did their best to disturb the performance by dropping bombs. This only shows how strong is the hold of German art in this country. And until there is a persistent propaganda of the art of other countries, things are not likely to be different.

To this knowledge of German opera is due the fact that when in due course—on March 10, to be accurate—Sir Thomas Beecham revived Wagner's comic opera, 'The Mastersingers,' one of the largest audiences that was ever attracted in London by the performance of opera in English assembled at Covent Garden. The house was packed from floor to ceiling at half-past six o'clock, and remained in that condition until half-past eleven. This, incidentally, does away with the contention that the public will not come earlier to performances, and once more illustrates the fact that if the public want a thing they will do anything to get it. Thus I may assume that the public want German music, or, at least, German opera.

The performance was in every way notable, and in its general effect was entirely satisfactory. Mr. Frederick Ranalow as Hans Sachs particularly distinguished himself. It was an individual reading, owing little to tradition and still less to any reading by one or other of the various Herren who have sung the part in London since I first heard the work in the famous 'eighties. But this individuality of treatment was the distinguishing feature of the whole performance, and to my mind demonstrated the fact that if we could but have an opera of our own, owing nothing to foreign example—Italian, French, or German—there would be some astonishing results. At present if we give a foreign opera the executants seem always obsessed with the idea of what Monsieur, Signor, or Herr So-and-so did in the part. Further, it cannot be forgotten that as often as not the British Anglo-Saxon is asked to portray a Latin—a thing well-nigh impossible to do with conviction. Thus the performance of 'The Mastersingers' was very much in English. Happily it did no harm to the music, but of the German spirit it had none. Yet nevertheless it was effective. As I have already mentioned, Mr. Ranalow's Hans Sachs was excellent. It was genial, picturesque, and vocally sound. Then Mr. Webster Millar made a good if lyrical Walter, always phrasing well and acting with pleasant dignity. Mr. Edmund Burke's Pogner was becomingly heavy, and Mr. Herbert Langley's Beckmesser a creation of his own. It is quite the best thing he has done, for his special peculiarities of voice were of much service and his acting in the right spirit of burlesque. I do not think I have ever heard quite such a humorous performance of the Serenade. Mr. Langley depicted with wonderful fidelity the way in which the cantankerous Town Clerk 'got the wind up' on that occasion. Mr. Maurice D'Oisly's David won my admiration for its exactness. Miss Marian Licette's Eva was the least satisfactory part of the performance. But the character is unsympathetic at best, and the music happens to lie in the least attractive part of Miss Licette's voice, whose costume, completed by a somewhat awe-inspiring cap, did not help matters. Miss Edith Clegg's Magdalene was useful, as was the work of the councillors. The final scene was uncommonly well done, with plenty of vivacity in the crowd and good choral singing. The score, which to-day seems full of reminiscences in points of orchestration—so widely has it been used as an example—was superbly played, the only thing to regret being that in his anxiety to bring it all out Sir Thomas Beecham, who conducted, occasionally forgot that there was anyone singing, a matter which the audience probably noticed, since the voices were for the most part overwhelmed. The reception was enthusiastic to a degree, and Sir Thomas will probably never cease to regret that he did not put the work on earlier, so great has been the demand for seats.

THE GENERAL REPERTOIRE

Before 'The Mastersingers' was reached there were several revivals of works the Company has already given at one time or another but did not include in the earlier season at Covent Garden. I may remark in passing that this plan of wider operations has proved of decided advantage in the eyes of the public. The audiences have been much larger than they were when the mainstay was Russian opera varied by 'Tristan.' As to what has been done, it is best to make the record chronological. The season began on February 24 with 'Parsifal.' Although it is the peculiar property of this Company, since it was the first to represent the work in the vernacular, there were small indications of pride of possession. Truth to tell, the representation was not as good as it had been, save for the Gurnemanz of Mr. Norman Allin and the Kundry of Miss Gladys Ancrum. Both have improved, but there was a good deal of slackness in the remainder. I expected very much better tone from the Knights of the Grail, and the Flower Maidens' twelve parts sounded thin. New impersonations were found in the Amfortas of Mr. Edmund Burke and the Parsifal of Mr. Walter Hyde. The latter was particularly good, as having the right vocal depth for the music. Mr. Burke was expressive but indistinct. The orchestral playing was extremely fine, a matter to which Mr. Albert Coates attended with consistent success.

Bizet's 'The Fair Maid of Perth' was revived the next evening. It went better than when first given by this Company three years ago, but nothing will convince me that it is worth reviving. It is not kind to the memory of a genius to bring a thing of this kind against him. It is pretty and tuneful, though condemned as 'Wagnerian' in its day; but it might have been written by anyone. However, since Manchester approved it—so we are told in the official communiqué—then London must have it. Of course, 'What Lancashire thinks to-day, &c.,' still holds good in most things, but not, I fancy, in matters operatic. The audience liked the Serenade as gracefully phrased by Mr. Webster Millar, but as a matter of fact it is more in the style of Louisa Puget than of Georges Bizet. There was a new Catherine in Miss Sylvia Nelis, a singer whose weakness of method even the delightful acoustic properties of Covent Garden cannot assist, and Mr. Norman Allin took part. Mr. Foster Richardson gave the Drinking Song—the one thing that has survived—very finely, and Mr. Walter Hyde's vocal versatility was of service in the part of the Duke, originally written for a baritone. The Carnival dance in the snow was overdone. Bizet did his best to write a Scottish tune for the number—it served equally well as a Spanish tune in 'Carmen'—but the steps were anything but 'reel,' and savoured too much of the 'steppes.' Sir Thomas Beecham conducted with loving care. 'Samson and Delilah' followed. M. Saint-Saëns's masterly work is firmly established in the esteem of the English public, and Charles Manners did well when, ten years ago, he added it and 'Madama Butterfly' to the then somewhat restricted repertoire of works in the vernacular. The Beecham Company—in this instance crystallised in Miss Edna Thornton—does it remarkably well. Miss Thornton has improved vastly, and there is plenty of freedom in Mr. F. Blamey's Samson; after all 'a big man with a small voice' is largely true to nature. Mr. Richardson was the Aged Hebrew, and Mr. Burke the High Priest. The chorus was good and the orchestra splendid. Mr. Percy Pitt conducted.

Next in the operatic sequence came 'Tristan and Isolde,' remarkable in this case for Miss Agnes Nicholls's reading of the soprano music. Again individuality was the note, and I was much struck but the effect of the singer's pure tone and absence of Sprechgesang. Mrs. Gladys Ancrum's Brangaene was dramatic, Mr. Ranalow was King Mark, Mr. Herbert Langley Kurwenal, and Mr. Frank Mullings Tristan. Sir Thomas Beecham conducted.

After 'Tristan' the Company seemed to regard Gounod's 'Faust'—which was given at the matinée—as beneath its notice. I have heard this opera under many conditions and in many places, but I sincerely trust I may never hear a worse performance. Mr. Burke alone stood out, though his Mephistopheles was not in the vein Gounod intended. But the performance generally disregarded the whole import of the story and ignored the charm of the music. Mr. Eric Marshall made his first appearance as Valentine without showing any particular qualification as an operatic singer; Miss Licette was the Marguerite, and Mr. O'Brien the Faust. The untuneful chorus-singing and the slovenly orchestral playing, to say nothing of the fumbling at the organ in the Church Scene, and Mr. Eugène Goossens's attitude at the conductor's desk, while emphasising the fact that England is a free country rather suggested that the Company had better have left this opera in the country. Some effort might have been made to respect the fine Covent Garden traditions even if the Company had none of its own. 'Tannhäuser,' presented the following week, was also a revival. It was not a distinguished performance. Madame Elsa Stralia brought her experience to bear with good result as Elizabeth, Mr. Mullings was a forcible Tannhäuser, Miss Gladys Ancrum the Venus and Mr. William Michael the Wolfram, a part M. Dinh Gilly was announced to have taken. It was a somewhat rough-and-ready performance of a work well-beloved by the British public, and the roughness and the readiness were both emphasised by the general acceleration of the tempi. The Company badly needs a chorus-master. Mr. Albert Coates directed the performance. On March 9 Mozart's 'Seraglio' was again represented by the Company. It is not clear why. The work, which has all the charm that genius can impart, is not suitable for so large a theatre, and much of its effect was lost. I was glad to note, however, that the tendency to run it on the lines of a revue had been abandoned. Miss Bessie Tyas took the place of Miss Licette as Constance at the last moment, so that all possibility of any hint of the real nature of the wonderful soprano music was lost. Indeed, like the Emperor, she found 'a deal too many notes in it.' Miss Madeline Collins, who sang Juliet with the Company in 1918 at Drury Lane, reappeared after devoting the interval, as was wise, to study. As Blonde she showed improved methods, but much inexperience. Mr. D'Oisly as Belmont, Mr. Norman Allin as Osmin, and Mr. Walter Hyde as Pedrillo completed the cast. Sir Thomas Beecham conducted, and seemed to derive more enjoyment from the performance than anyone else.

DELIUS'S 'A VILLAGE ROMEO AND JULIET'

The one solitary British work in the scheme was reached on March 19, when Mr. Frederick Delius's opera 'A Village Romeo and Juliet' was revived—too late for this month's notes.

OPERA AT THE SURREY THEATRE

The performances by the Fairbairn-Miln Company at the Surrey theatre have grown in popularity. There is no doubt that the Surrey side welcomes the opportunity of improving its acquaintance with grand opera. At the Old Vic, where good work has been going on for some time, samples have been given to the people, with the result that they are clearly anxious and ready to take advantage of the efforts of a professional organization appearing every night, with Saturday matinées. Also wise counsels have prevailed in the matter of the orchestra, which, if on the small side, is great in efficiency. This is a much appreciated feature. On the stage there has been much earnest work, but I cannot help thinking that the Company would do well to rehearse its productions on the stage more thoroughly. In the circumstances many chances have to be taken, and beginners must be tried, but I should like to see them a little more familiar with at least their entrances and their exits. Two works were added to the repertoire during the month, and very notable additions they are to a programme for the people. The first was Mozart's 'Don Giovanni,' and the second Wagner's 'The Valkyrie.' They were received with ready approval. I should like to suggest that matters would be improved if the audiences were told exactly what the operas are all about. In these days of the adaptability of the cinematograph I should say that five minutes with a machine, a screen, and some plain wording would help immensely. There was some good singing in 'Don Giovanni,' particularly by Miss Maryan Elmar as Donna Elvira, Mr. Lyon Mackie as Ottavio, with a dramatic Donna Anna in Miss Ida Cooper, an original Leporello in Mr. P. Valentine, a pretty Zerlina in Miss Frances Hall, and an effective Don in Mr. Augustus Milner. Dialogue and recitative were both used. The large audience was clearly interested—but also puzzled.

The performance of 'The Valkyrie,' though not free from shortcomings, is entitled to the warmest commendation for the reason that it made the work perfectly comprehensible. It was a thoroughly understandable representation of this significant section of the great trilogy, and was received with close attention and obvious interest. The performer most at home was Mr. Augustus Milner, the Wotan, but high promise was shown by Miss Mabel Corran, the Fricka. Miss Ethel Peake sang well such portions of the music of Brunnhilde as she remembered, Miss Aida Faville made good use of a pleasing voice as Sieglinde, Mr. Edward McKeown gave fine promise as Siegmund, and Mr. Andrew Shanks sang to good purpose as Hunding. The orchestral part was given by Mr. Herbert Ferrers as well as means permitted, and the whole production was carried out in a spirit of earnestness that was most heartening.

The undertaking has very justly received the blessing of the Mayor and Corporation of Southwark, and it looks as if the Borough would give its support in the practical form of a rate. There is no reason why it should not. The scheme represents a policy of self-help, and as the good people of the Borough have shown a liking for opera there is no reason why they should not have it. Moreover it is vastly more informing than the average entertainment, be it music-hall or cinema, and represents a combination of the arts no other form can supply.

To complete the operatic record of the month mention should be made of the excellent performances of Goring Thomas's charming work 'The Golden Web,' given at the Royal Academy of Music. The students at least made it clear that the opera is worth reviving.

THE LIGHT OPERA FIELD

Nothing has been put forward in the light opera field during the month. The Londoner evidently misses the Gilbert and Sullivan works, a point to which I wish to draw Mr. Carte's attention. A new work by M. Cuvillier has been produced at the Empire in the shape of the Eastern piece 'The Sunshine of the World.' There is a definite story by Miss Gladys Unger and M. K. K. Adraschir, with lyrics by James Head. It is a story of 1739 in which the Koh-i-noor has a part. But it seemed to me that there was too much story for an opera and too much music for a play. M. Cuvillier might have carried off the effect had his music been more adequate. As it is his score suggests that his powers are limited, and are at their best in an unassuming gallery like that of 'The Wild Geese.' Some of the numbers are effective, such as the 'Vision of the Houris,' but in the rest there was too much of the music-hall and too little of the musician. Miss Clara Simons, Mr. Randle Ayrton, Mr. George Bishop, and Mr. Alfred Clark appeared in it, and Mr. Howard Carr, who conducted, made the most of the rather ineffective orchestration. I should record also a musical version of Capt. Marshall's farce 'His Excellency the Governor,' produced as 'The Love Flower' at the Kennington Theatre on March 15, as the music is by the gifted hand of Mr. Hermann Finck. His powers seem to have been somewhat checked by the limitations of his exponents.

THE BARRIE BALLET

If opinions are divided concerning the exact merits of Sir J. M. Barrie's latest fantasy 'The Truth about the Russian Ballet,' produced at the Coliseum on March 15, there can be no question as to the worth of the accompanying music by Mr. Arnold Bax. He has done nothing better. The point of the piece is that Karissima (Mlle. Karsavina), a member of the Russian Ballet who weds a lord, speaks only with her feet. Thus a difficult task is assigned to Mr. Bax, that of illustrating her remarks. He has done it in an exceedingly felicitous manner. The music is tuneful, graphic, and at the same time thoroughly modern. A Wedding March and a Funeral Dirge are among numbers that are particularly striking, while the composer has his own joke by imparting to the orchestral introduction a strong flavour of Scottish music. Elsewhere he hints at the Russian origin of Mlle. Karsavina with much skill, and at all points reveals himself in a new and particularly gratifying light, since he shows the ability to grasp the requirements of the situation without sacrificing his art. The music is well played under Mr. Alfred Dove's direction.

Choral Notes and News

By W. McNAUGHT

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

Amid the present repairing of our musical life nothing is more typical of a return to old conditions than the Handel Festival, which looms large over the coming summer season. The measure of its success will throw some light on that vague and fluctuating thing—public taste. Probably the Old Guard will be there in force; it is still a strong body, and in these Scriabin days it has no rallying point. But it does not depend entirely on loyalty and faith. The new generation of musicians is said to be weary of the emotional; it wants no more heart-beats in music. Beethoven and Wagner led only to the blind alley of Strauss, &c. It is re-discovering in the past—in Palestrina, Boyce, Purcell, and Haydn—some of the spirit it wants to infuse into present-day music. May it not draw some inspiration from the Handel Chorus with its dauntless progress, its proud superiority to all doubts and hesitations? As with all great music of the past, that of Handel has elements that are only revealed to perceptions sharpened by modern ideas, and our enterprising younger composers and their host of admirers might acquire some new and suggestive outlook from a good dosing of 'Israel,' 'Judas,' and 'Samson.' Of course Handel's choral music has other parts to play that make it worthy of preservation. It is the best choral exercise in existence. A choir well-grounded in Handel is better qualified for its Elgar, its Delius, and its Wilbye than one whose early studies have been confined to the part-song school, and the more incentive there is given to choralists for Handelian practice and enjoyment the better it will be for their singing in all kinds of music—even if they only learn to breathe better.

Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock, the general factotum of the Festival, reports that recruiting both for choir and orchestra is proceeding busily, but that there is still room for an improved membership. Dr. Henry Coward has arranged to send a numerous contingent of singers from Sheffield, Leeds, and Huddersfield. The rehearsals of the London contingent are to commence on May 10, at 7.30 p.m., at Westminster Chapel, Buckingham Gate.

The following is the probable programme of the Festival:

JUNE 19 (12.30 p.m.)

JUNE 26 (2.30 p.m.)

'The Messiah'

Soloists: Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Robert Radford.

Musical Director and Organist, Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock.
Conductor, Sir Frederic Cowen.

Congratulations to Mr. C. Kennedy Scott and the Philharmonic Choir on their excellent start. The experience of hearing the full orchestral and choral rehearsal of Delius's 'Song of the high hills' was sufficient evidence that London's new choir is destined to rank high. The precision with which it threaded its way through the harmonic maze of the unaccompanied music, and kept perfect intonation for the re-entry of the orchestra, was a notable technical feat. Not many choirs could be certain of doing this—perhaps even the Philharmonic Choir would not make a 'bull's-eye' every time. Incidentally, this is an example of unpractical—one might say unfair—writing on the composer's part. There is always a tendency for unsupported voices to sing in the untuned scale, and when they make modulation after modulation, it is a mere matter of arithmetic that they will lose the original pitch. Perhaps in the continual balancing of error they will maintain or return to it. But when accompaniments are to be re-introduced after an unaccompanied passage, there is more to be gained than lost by doubling voice-parts unobtrusively by a few instruments. It can be done so that the impression of unaccompanied singing is not destroyed. However, the Philharmonic Choir made good without this help. The words of Mr. Kalisch in another column, and various tributes in the daily Press, have registered the success of the Choir's first venture. During the early rehearsals, it appears, the Choir's form was not encouraging, but at a later stage there was a marked rally.

THE ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY

A large audience came to the Royal Albert Hall on March 13 to hear 'The Dream of Gerontius,' the work in which the Royal Choral Society is at its best. The choir seems to understand the intimate type of interpretation and at the same time the vitality of expression which this music demands. Under Sir Frederick Bridge's direction these qualities were well marked in the choral singing, and moreover the technical demands of the work—once considered exorbitant—were met with apparent ease. The solo music was in good hands, being entrusted to Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Captain Herbert Heyner.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.—Under Dr. Thomas Keighley's direction a concert performance of 'Carmen' was given at Albion School on March 9, with a choir of eighty voices and a small orchestra.

BATTERSEA.—A concert was announced by the Battersea, Clapham, and Wandsworth L.C.C. Institute's Choral Union on March 19, at Battersea Town Hall, under Mr. George Lane's direction. The programme included Bridge's 'Ballad of the Clampherdown,' Elgar's 'The Black Knight,' and part-songs by British composers.

BROMLEY.—'Elijah' was performed with admirable effect by the Bromley Choral Society on February 17, under the direction of Mr. Frederic Fertel. The solo parts were taken by Miss Dora Gibson, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Herbert Heyner.

CROYDON.—Under Mr. Alan J. Kirby's direction, Parry's 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin' was excellently performed by the Croydon Philharmonic Society at the Baths Hall, on February 28. The expression was lively, and the tone good. The choir also joined Mr. Frederick Ranalow in Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea.' A contingent of the London Symphony Orchestra took part, being also heard separately in Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and other works under Mr. W. H. Reed's direction.

EALING.—High praise was won—and well deserved—by the Ealing Philharmonic Society for its performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' at Ealing Town Hall on February 21, under the direction of Mr. E. Victor Williams. There are few local choral societies that could undertake so exacting a work with so full command of its executive difficulties and realization of its depth and subtlety as were shown by this choir. The standard of the choral work was maintained in the solo singing of Miss Astra Desmond, Mr. Arthur Jordan, and Mr. Dan Richards. The performance was repeated on February 23.

GRANTHAM.—The Grantham Philharmonic Society, founded in 1869, celebrated its jubilee season on March 4 by a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' and Gounod's 'Faust.' The excellent choral singing was well supported by an orchestra of forty, and this concert brought a most successful season to a close. The soloists were Miss Jennie Hook, Miss Gladys Parker, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. Bridge Peters. Mr. Edward Brown conducted.

The operations of the various choral committees connected with the Nonconformist Choir Union, suspended by the war, have now been resumed. This has been rendered possible by the Crystal Palace authorities offering special facilities for the Festival Concerts to be given at Sydenham as in former years. The Nonconformist Choir Union is arranging its twenty-seventh Festival for Saturday, July 10, when it is hoped to give a concert by three thousand singers under the baton of Mr. Frank Idle.

A concert by the Novello Choir is announced for May 8, at Central Hall, Westminster, under the direction of Mr. H. L. Brooke. The choral works to be performed are Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' and Parry's 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin,' and the orchestra, led by Mr. W. H. Reed, will be heard in Balfour Gardiner's 'Comedy Overture.' The soloists are Mr. Frank Webster and Mr. Joseph Farrington (vocalists), and Miss Winifred Small (violin).

The first concert of the Cecilia Ladies' Choir, given at Wigmore Hall on March 20, was both interesting and novel, for choirs of ladies' voices are rarely heard on London concert platforms. Mr. Herman Klein, the organizer and conductor of this choir, has brought together some rich voices, which produce an ensemble pleasing to the ear, and it was shown in the course of a long programme that he has taught them unity and expressiveness. Two works by British composers received their first performance, viz., Dr. C. B. Rootham's 'The Quest,' with accompaniment of pianoforte and strings, and 'As the leaves fall,' by Harold E. Darke, for soprano solo, women's voices, and small orchestra.

The concert of the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society drew a large audience to the Northern Polytechnic on March 6. The chief interest in the programme was the first performance of Sir Charles Stanford's 'Merlin and the gleam,' for baritone (Mr. Frederick Ranalow), chorus, and orchestra, a work of warm melody and rich colouring. Under the composer's direction the choir gave a performance that was full of life and interest. Sir Charles Stanford also conducted his 'Songs of the Fleet' and the programme further included Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast,' given under Mr. Allen Gill's direction with Mr. Hubert Eisdell as soloist.

The Mansfield House Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Ernest Coward, gave a well-designed concert on February 26 at the Public Hall, Canning Town. Parry's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' was creditably performed, with Miss Kathleen Markwell and Mr. Arthur Ackerman as soloists; Elgar's 'From the Bavarian Highlands' was also given; the orchestra played Sterndale Bennett's Overture, 'The Naiades,' and Luigini's 'Ballet Egyptian'; and the choir was heard alone in Eaton Fanning's 'Moonlight.'

'MAYFLOWER' TERCENTENARY CELEBRATIONS

MUSICAL ARRANGEMENTS

Three hundred years have passed since the Pilgrim Fathers sailed in the 'Mayflower' from Plymouth. For several months past preparations have been made for an adequate celebration of the historic event which led to the founding of the American Republic. The celebrations will be carried out under the joint auspices of a committee dealing especially with the international relations, with Lord Weardale and Lord Bryce for its chairman and vice-chairman; and by a council, under the chairmanship of Dr. Rendel Harris, dealing with the religious aspect of the movement. Commemoration gatherings are planned for Plymouth during the first week in September. Pilgrimages are being organized to Scrooby, Southampton, and other places with which the 'Mayflower' Pilgrims were connected, and a great meeting will be held in the Royal Albert Hall. The 'Mayflower' Pageant will be given nightly in the Horticultural Hall, London, during the month of October, and the same Pageant will be represented in several of the large provincial cities.

In all these celebrations music will play an important part. The services of Dr. Henry Coward of Sheffield have been secured for the Plymouth gatherings. Strong local committees have been formed—one dealing with music. It is proposed to organize a choir of five hundred adult singers, who will sing anthems and choruses, and a young people's choir will be formed for performing a cantata, 'The Ship of Adventure,' that has been specially composed for the celebrations. In addition, there will be a great open air gathering of children and young people on the Hoe, when it is expected that upwards of ten thousand will assemble to sing choruses and songs, and probably to witness part of the Pageant suitable for the occasion. Already in several large cities arrangements have been made for celebration of the tercentenary, in which the aid of choirs will be enlisted. For religious services 'Orders of Worship' have been prepared—(a) for adults, (b) for young people. [For public gatherings, selections of suitable hymns are being issued. Already the 'Mayflower Song Book,' compiled by Dr. Rendel Harris and the Rev. Carey Bonner, has been published.

Representative committees have been at work in America and other countries, and there will be a large contingent of Americans present at the various gatherings, with representatives from Holland, Switzerland, France, and other European countries.

Chamber Music for Amateurs

[Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur chamber musicians who wish to get into touch with other players. We shall be glad if those making use of the scheme will let us know when their announcements have borne fruit. Failing such notice, advertisements will be inserted three times.]

Lady viola player seeks chamber music or orchestral practice in S.W. district, Streatham or Brixton preferred.—'OMEGA,' c/o Musical Times.

Viola and clarinet player wishes to join in practice of any kind of good music. Most evenings free. Within two miles of Charing Cross.—CLARIVIOLA, c/o Musical Times.

Pianist wishes to join chamber music party. He is also a clarinet player.—WILLIAM ROLLISON, 104, Cadogan Terrace, Victoria Park, E.9.

Violinist wishes to join trio or quartet party. Leeds district.—RICHARD P. STEAD, 8, Thornhill Terrace, Wortley, Leeds.

Pianist desires to form quartet for study of good music. Violinists and 'cellist. Any afternoon or evening. N., N.E., or N.W. district preferred.—N. V. C., c/o Musical Times.

Violinist wishes to meet players for study of classical trios or quartets. Must be good players. He would also like to join a good musical society in Norwood or district. Any afternoon or evening.—CREMONA, c/o Musical Times.

A splendid opportunity for recital work in a well known Central London Church is offered to a really competent string quartet and vocal quartet. Beautiful building with fine acoustic properties; easily accessible by tube, train, tram, or 'bus. A room in the crypt, containing a grand pianoforte, is available for rehearsals. It is hoped to arrange (week-day) monthly recitals of classical chamber music and unaccompanied motets, &c.—F. G. P., 52, Primrose Mansions, Battersea Park, S.W. 11.

Pianist would like to meet with number of players, stringed instruments preferred, for practice of classical and modern music. Would also play with amateur orchestra. Manchester district.—'Alceste,' c/o Musical Times.

Good amateur string players required for symphony orchestra, and to co-operate with choral Society. Short test required. Rehearsals Wednesday evenings, near Liverpool Street.—J. H. CHISHAM, 30, Broke Road, Dalston, E.8.

Flautist (not a beginner) desires co-operation with pianist and small party, locally. Not too advanced. Evenings. Mr. M. MATHEW, 97, Cromwell Road, Wimbledon.

THE CONCERT PROGRAMME

By NICHOLAS C. GATTY

It is a common experience for the musical critic on his daily round of the London concert-halls to meet with badly constructed programmes, and one cannot help thinking that the importance of the selection and arrangement of the music to be performed, in view of the success of the whole concert, is not sufficiently realised. As so many factors have to be taken into account the choosing is not an easy matter, but that is no reason why the question should not be very carefully considered from every point of view so as to get the best possible results. Take first the programme of a new-comer. Here we have a young artist to whom it is a prime consideration that a favourable impression should be made. What shall he or she play or sing? Obviously the music should seek to display the young musician's technical skill; it should also give a decided clue concerning matters of taste and artistic leanings, while on no account must the choice neglect works likely to test interpretative ability and the emotional side. As I do not think it is the new-comer's business to attempt to attract attention in any other way, there should be no fear that in drawing up a scheme suitable for effecting what I have named it may be deemed hackneyed in character or uninteresting. The whole essence of the matter is that the interest should lie in the performance. It so happens that the most hackneyed music is that which is the best adapted for this particular purpose, and it should not be forgotten that those who call it so are professional people and not the general public. Now it is to the latter that the young recitalist in the long run makes appeal, since the artist who cannot impress a mixed audience can never hope to be successful. The new-comer indeed cannot do otherwise than look for a comparative judgment. When, for example, a young pianist plays the 'Appassionata' Sonata, the hearers naturally refer the performance to some previously acquired standard set up in their minds by past experiences. The layman cannot do this if the music is unfamiliar. Then with regard to the personal side of the matter it is highly important that there should be no confusion. I find that frequently the selection made is so wide in scope and style that it becomes impossible to analyse the powers of interpretation properly, the truth being that the particular artist having formed no style at all is still in the experimental stage, and apparently is attempting to find out which class of music goes down best. The folly of such a procedure is great. These musicians must learn that without personal conviction they can never get control over an audience, and that the note of conviction is never struck unless the artist really honestly and sincerely cares immensely for the music sung or played. This conviction, this individual colouring of the performance, entirely due to enthusiasm over the charm of the music itself, is comparatively rare, but I think it might be met with much more frequently if young artists would make a point of never performing those things with which they do not really feel themselves to be in sympathy. After all, there are many different styles and tastes, and it is not at all necessary that everyone should try for the same kind of reputation.

With experienced artists—those who have made a name for themselves—the case is, of course, different. They are the people who should be blamed for performing the same music over and over again, and for not introducing new music more frequently, or reviving that which has been half-forgotten. The chief evil of repetition is that the artists themselves get tired of the work, and, to overcome this, try to infuse a fresh interest by making new readings—a practice that grows sometimes to such an extent that the most fantastic and absurd licences are taken with masterpieces. This has of course a bad effect upon the public, who naturally take the performances as being authoritative, and a wrong standard is set up. One remembers before the war various conductors playing Beethoven's C minor Symphony, each apparently bent far more upon giving a different reading from that of the other man than upon interpreting the composer's meaning. As to novelties, well-known artists naturally draw such good audiences that it is easy for them to experiment in their programmes. I do not suggest that the inclusion of new music, or the exclusion of famous pieces, should be carried to extremes; but, rather, a reasonable mixture should be aimed at. The same thing applies, of course, to serial concerts of established reputation, alike of chamber and orchestral music.

Happily, in both directions, this policy obtains nowadays much more than formerly, and I am pretty sure that London audiences are quite satisfied. A certain amount of the performance of classical music is absolutely necessary; it is, indeed, quite as necessary as that of the newer schools. None would seriously propose to close the National Gallery, take down the masterpieces of the past, and exhibit only present-day paintings; and why old-world music should be subjected to a similar process it is hard to see. An audience cannot be entirely composed of people who have heard the 'Eroica' Symphony many times; there are, indeed, always many present who have never heard it at all. Such works will drop out of the repertory when there are enough equally interesting things to take their place, and not till then; that is, if the public has anything to say in the matter, and I rather fancy that the public will remain master of the situation in this respect.

Church and Organ Music

NEW CHURCH MUSIC

'O praise God in His Holiness' (anthem for four voices), Robert Whyte.

'O God, Who hast prepared,' John Mudd.

'Lead us, Heavenly Father,' F. W. Wadely.

'I heard a voice from Heaven,' C. Macpherson.

'Opening Sentences from the Burial Service,' George Holmes.

'Turn Thee unto me' (anthem), William Boyce.

'By the waters of Babylon,' H. Goetz.

[Novello.]

Robert Whyte (c. 1530-74) was one of the noted little group of English composers who did so much for English Church music about the time of the Reformation. He was organist of Ely from 1562 to 1567. His anthem for four voices, 'O praise God in His Holiness,' has been edited by John E. West from a MS. in the British Museum, and is well worthy the consideration of lovers of old polyphonic music. From the strong opening theme to the stately close it is full of good stuff. Especially telling is the più mosso section, 'Praise Him in the cymbals and dances,' with its reiterated notes against a running counterpoint. Readers of the Musical Times hardly need to be reminded that music of this type cannot be judged merely by playing it over. It needs to be sung; and choirs, who confine themselves to modern vocal works, mostly accompanied, are depriving themselves and their hearers of much in ignoring the music of our fine old English polyphonic writers.

Another example of the same school, though in different vein, is the setting for four voices of the Collect for the sixth Sunday after Trinity, 'O God, Who hast prepared,' by John Mudd, organist of Peterborough Cathedral, c. 1580-1620. Mr. H. Elliot Button has edited this charming little work, which provides ample opportunities for expressive, unaccompanied singing.

The anthem for four voices, 'Lead us, Heavenly Father,' displays the hand of the cultured musician. Mr. Wadely has provided a graceful tune for this well-known hymn, the treatment of which is effectively varied for each of its three verses. The first verse is in four parts throughout, and contains some melodious, smoothly-flowing writing for all the voices. In the second verse the two upper parts are silent. The melody is sung by tenors and basses in unison for the first two phrases, and is then continued by the tenors, while the basses add an expressive countertheme. A change of key for the last two lines gives point to the words and affords welcome contrast. At the resumption of the original key, the sopranos take up the melody, the altos and tenors joining in two beats later. The basses enter at the sixth bar, and some effective work follows. A sudden change of key leads to a final repetition of the last line of the hymn, forming an effective close (pp). The organ part is tastefully written, and is nowhere obtrusive. Well-balanced choirs, capable of refined singing, will welcome this admirable little work.

Choirmasters will be glad to see that the beautiful little movement, 'I heard a voice from Heaven,' which occurs in Dr. Macpherson's fine anthem 'Sing unto God' (recently reviewed in the Musical Times) may now be obtained separately. It is set for soprano solo and chorus (or quartet), and forms an ideal anthem for use at funerals, &c.

George Holmes was born in 1681, and held the post of organist of Lincoln Cathedral from 1705 till his death in 1721. He appears to have been a composer of considerable activity, though much of his work is to be found only in the choir books of Lincoln. In the Musical Times of July, 1913, the late Dr. W. H. Cummings wrote: 'The opening sentences of the Burial Service, "I am the Resurrection and the Life," were set by Holmes in such an admirable manner that they have been in continuous use from the time of their first production until now, being much preferred to the setting of Dr. Croft. It is very desirable that this composition should be published and made available for general use: at present it is only to be found in the Lincoln Cathedral books.' Thanks to Dr. G. J. Bennett, the present organist at Lincoln, choirs will now be able to make acquaintance with this work, which has been carefully edited and provided with expression marks. Sung unaccompanied, its simple but beautiful harmonies are perfectly fitted for use at funerals.

THE LONDON MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVAL.

BY AN ONLOOKER.

It is one of the gratifying signs of the times to find the old Musical Competition Festivals gradually resuming their activities, with, it is sincerely to be hoped, renewed vigour as well as life. Certainly there was plenty of activity at the London Musical Competition Festival (with which is incorporated the South and West London Musical Festival), held March 12-20 at the Central Hall, Westminster. No fewer than five thousand candidates were announced to have entered. Pleasing as this must have been from the promoters' point of view, it led to such huge entries for some of the classes that adjudication must have been somewhat embarrassing. In the Mezzo-Soprano Solo-Singing class alone there were 95 entries, and one of the remarkable things noticed was the few non-appearances of candidates. This speaks well for the excellent health and freedom from colds of the people of London. In this respect one is tempted to ask whether the present mode of dress for ladies with the exposed throat has not had peculiarly beneficial results. Many men would undoubtedly welcome a somewhat similar change in their own attire.

From a visitor's point of view it was regrettable that the large entries necessitated competitions being held simultaneously in three rooms, thereby precluding one from hearing more than a small proportion of the contests. Still more unfortunate was the fact that in some instances the preliminary tests had to be split into two sections and the adjudications thereon taken by different judges in separate rooms. The audiences were, on the whole, disappointing in numbers, being generally confined, apparently, to candidates and their special friends. One seemed to miss the atmosphere of the general public which forms such an exhilarating feature at similar Festivals in the provinces. The London Press is partly to blame. How healthy, and of what educational value it might have been, if a daily column had been devoted to this important event, even if it had necessitated the truncation of one of the many columns assigned to a peculiarly unpleasant case running simultaneously in the Law Courts!

Taken on the whole the management of the Festival was excellent; but one rather doubted whether sufficient consideration had been given to the fact that it was acclaimed as 'the London' Festival. Some classes were even open to the whole United Kingdom. It does not help matters musically if young people are able to carry away gold medals, first-prizes, and certificates at a London Festival unless they perform so excellently that they may conscientiously be considered as worthy to represent the best amateur work this great city can produce. The withholding of a first-prize, when not absolutely won on sheer merit, often assists greatly not only in stimulating to harder work, but in inducing candidates of higher excellence to enter on future occasions. Although it was announced that the adjudicators had been asked to make the standard higher than in previous years, one could not help feeling that, at least in some cases, it must be raised to a much more lofty level before it can be truly representative of London and the United Kingdom.

In the singing, which formed one of the most important features of the Festival, the terribly bad diction noticed again and again was deplorable. Excellent advice on this matter was given by some of the adjudicators. Every singer should learn elocution, and practise daily reading aloud. It is quite easy for a singer to find out for himself whether his words are distinct—sing the song to a friend who does not know it, and ask him to write them down. Clear articulation of final consonants, proper pronunciation of vowels—especially oo, ou, ow and u, as in soon, out, now, and mute (one continually heard the last word as me-oof)—and eradication of the common colloquial fault of slurring words together—e.g., atome for at home, due to lip-laziness—are points specially to remember. Other noticeable faults were:

(1) The habit of taking in breath at the last instant before attacking a phrase following a rest; often breath was taken with a quick gasp actually as the note had to be sung. (2) Exaggeration of portamento by constant slurring between small intervals—seconds and thirds—a vile habit. (3) Liberties taken in note-values. In the last case, particularly in a song by

John Ireland  were rendered over and over again as

In cases (such as in the Open Competition and Choral Classes) where competitors are allowed to choose their pieces, it would be kind to the audience if the titles and composers were announced from the platform. The 'Daily Telegraph Choral Championship' brought forward eight very creditable choirs, all of which showed promise for the future. The singing of the Maidstone Choral Union (Mr. F. Wilson Parish, conductor) was particularly good in the test-piece, 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' (Madrigal by John Wilbye), and Elgar's 'My love dwelt in a Northern land.'

Some fine work was shown in the gold medal competition for Pianoforte solo, sixty-eight candidates entering. The test-pieces were 'The Island Spell,' by John Ireland, and 'Etude de Concert,' by MacDowell, both difficult pieces, often performed with remarkable technical ability by youthful players. The weakest feature in all the instrumental work the writer heard was that of interpretation. As one of the adjudicators said, 'The pieces were played as pianoforte solos, not as if they had a story to tell.' Good technique must be treated solely as a means to an end—to make music appeal to the listener as a living picture. Modern harmony, rhythm, and even time produce wonderful atmospheric effects, and pieces like 'The Island Spell' and Debussy's Arabesque in E become either deadlly dull or enchantingly bewitching just according to whether they are played from a purely technical or an atmospheric standpoint.

The adjudications all round were, on the whole, remarkably good and most conscientiously performed.

The following is a synopsis of entries, tests, and results in the choral and orchestral competitions :

PEOPLE'S PALACE MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

An important part of this well-established fixture is the Children's Festival, usually held some weeks in advance of the adult competitions. This year the children's days were February 26 and 28. On the former occasion classes from Jewish schools competed. On the 28th—a Saturday—activities commenced as early as 10 a.m., and continued with practically no break until after the presentation of prizes at 4.30 p.m. The standard reached was very high. There can be no better proof of the beneficial results of the Festival than the admirable discipline and refined tone of the singing classes of these East-End schools. There is even a danger of over-refinement, if we may judge from one or two of the best choirs, where a little more vitality, even at the cost of purity of tone, would have been welcome. Articulation varied in excellence. It was good to note that the Cockney twang was hardly ever present; it was not so good to hear substituted therefor what may be called 'fine' speech—the kind of fineness that gives us 'nace' for 'nice,' for example. These small cavillings over, there can be nothing but the heartiest praise for the work all round—not forgetting the excellent organization by Miss Edith Barran and the Rev. C. J. Beresford, the hon. secretaries. It should be added that on the evening of February 26, Evening Institute Classes, both S.S.A. and S.A.T.B., competed, and showed excellent form, especially in the case of the latter. The singing of Benet's 'Flow, O my tears' in its sostenuto and pure chording was astonishingly good. Mr. Harvey Grace judged, and Mr. W. McNaught was in charge of the sight-singing.

SIGHT-READING (ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS).

- 1st. Portman Place Girls' School, Mile End (Miss G. E. Bowes).
- 2nd. Smeed Road Girls' School, Bow (Miss A. Hedley).

1st, St. Simon's, Bethnal Green, Band of Hope.

The prizes were distributed by Lady Mary Cambridge, in the presence of H.R.H. Princess Alice, Countess of Athlone, president of the Festival.

PLYMOUTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The sixth Plymouth Musical Festival, held during the week beginning March 1, showed distinct progress since last year and broke new ground. Four new sections were introduced. At the instigation of Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, who adjudicated last year and again this year, classes were arranged for church and chapel choirs of mixed voices or of boys and men. No country choirs came, but an encouraging start was given by two church boy choirs and three chapel mixed choirs. Another interesting innovation was a class for operatic solo (female), to be sung in character and with action. Pianoforte duet and string quartet were the other novelties.

The adjudicators in the music section were Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, and Dr. Vaughan Thomas. Mr. Nicholson said he found the standard higher than in the previous year in most classes. In the composition class it was, however, deplorably low. Where candidates selected their own music, the choice was higher than formerly, but might further be considerably advanced.

In the two classes for school choirs of age under twelve and over twelve the prizes were taken by the Royal United Service Orphan Home, whose chosen tests were Pinsuti's 'For hearth and home' and Ireland's 'There is a garden.' In the former class Ivybridge Council School sang Parry's 'And did those feet.' St. Dunstan's Abbey was first, with Luard-Selby's 'A garden by the sea,' in the class for High and Secondary Schools. Plymouth Co-operative Junior Choir was best among the Sunday Schools, &c.

The successful adult choirs were Peverell Wesleyan mixed voices, King Street Ladies' Choir, Clarion Male Choir, and Torpoint Wesleyan.

NEWCASTLE.—The second North of England Musical Tournament (open to Northumberland, Durham, Cumberland, Warrmorland, and the North Riding) will be held at Newcastle on June 19-26. Over a hundred classes are open to competition, covering the usual forms of musical performance—solo and concerted—with elocution, folk-dancing, Northumbrian pipes, and brass bands. The syllabus is obtainable from the Secretary, Tournament Office, 13, Mosley Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

William Boyce (1710-79), best known, perhaps, by his collection of Cathedral music of the 16th and 17th centuries, was a voluminous composer of vocal and instrumental music, both secular and for the Church. He wrote over forty anthems, the main characteristics of which are a solid dignity of style and sound musicianship. Choirs of adequate resources who are acquainted with and appreciate the merits of this composer's well-known 'O where shall wisdom be found' and 'By the waters of Babylon,' may safely be recommended to try their powers on 'Turn Thee unto me,' which has been edited by Mr. John E. West. It is for five voices (S.S.A.T.B.) and in three movements. In the first and last, contrapuntal methods largely prevail, the voices occasionally coming together in masses of harmony. The middle movement is an expressive little duet for two sopranos. A misprint occurs at the top of page 6, where the tied E in the second soprano part should be a crotchet.

The first movement from H. Goetz's cantata 'By the waters of Babylon' may now be obtained separately. It makes a serviceable anthem of moderate difficulty. There is much smoothly-written imitative work for the voices, and an independent accompaniment adapted from the full score adds materially to the effect.

SECURITY OF TENURE FOR THE ORGANIST

In the Musical Times of August, 1917, we printed in full the Royal College of Organists' memorandum to the Archbishops on the above subject, and in the November number following an article appeared on 'The Organist's Position.' The matter has been less to the fore of late, but the formation of Parish Councils under the Church of England Assembly Act has revived interest. It will be remembered that after the R.C.O. deputation's interview at Lambeth Palace, the Archbishop wrote to Dr. Harding pointing out that the security of tenure which organists desired might be gained through these Councils. The R.C.O. Council has recently discussed the subject, and as a result has issued a note suggesting that every organist should attend the meeting of the Parish Council of the Church at which he holds office, and propose the following resolution:

'That the Organist and Choirmaster shall be appointed by the Vicar and Churchwardens, acting jointly, but shall not be compelled to relinquish his appointment except at the request of the Vicar, the Churchwardens, and the Parish Church Council.'

We believe that such hard cases as were described in the Musical Times of November, 1917, would be impossible under the conditions set forth in this resolution. It is to be hoped that organists will seize this opportunity of securing themselves against the capricious dismissals which have been far too frequent in the past.

NEW ORGANIST OF BIRMINGHAM PARISH CHURCH

Mr. Richard Wassell, who has been appointed organist and choirmaster of St. Martin's, Birmingham, the Parish Church, is a well-known Midland organist, teacher, and conductor who has done a good deal of late for the development of music in the district. He goes to St. Martin's from St. Michael's, Handsworth, where he has officiated since 1906, his previous posts having been St. John's, Ladywood, 1902-06 (where the late A. R. Gaul was organist for many years), St. Thomas in the Moors, Balsall Heath, 1900-02, St. George's Presbyterian Church, Handsworth, 1897-1900, Gospel Oak Wesleyan Church, Tipton, 1896-97, and various minor posts from the year 1890. Mr. Wassell was born at Tipton in 1880. He is conductor of the Birmingham Choral Union, founder and conductor of the Wassell Orchestra! Concerts, professor of singing at the Midland Institute, and head music-master of Queenwood Public School, Clapham Park, London. The organ at St. Martin's is a fine modern instrument, at present unfinished. Mr. Wassell's appointment is the result of a wide search on the part of the Rector (the Rev. E. Grose Hodge) to discover the best available musician for the post. Mr. Wassell's ambition is to make the Church a centre of congregational singing and organ recitals.

SOUTHWARK CATHEDRAL

On Saturday afternoon, March 20, Bach's Passion Music ('St. Matthew') was sung at Southwark Cathedral, under the conductorship of Mr. E. T. Cook (Cathedral organist), accompanied by a full orchestra led by Mr. W. H. Reed. A feature of the performance was the unaccompanied singing of all the chorales. Mr. Francis W. Sutton (sub-organist) was at the organ, and Mr. E. Stanley Roper (organist of H.M. Chapel Royal) played the pianoforte accompaniments to the recitatives. There was a crowded congregation.

The Holy Week music to be sung at St. John's, Wilton Road, is worthy of note. Here is the list:

PALM SUNDAY (10.45 a.m.)

'Hosanna'	Gibbons
'On the Mount of Olives'	De Vico
'Lo! the children of the Hebrews'	Gounod
'All Glory, Laud, and Honour'	Bach
The Passion (according to St. Matthew)	Vittoria

(7.0 p.m.)

'Magnificat'	Byrd
'O all ye that pass by'	Vittoria

GOOD FRIDAY (10.45 a.m.)

The Passion (according to St. John)	Vittoria
The Reproaches	Palestrina

8.0 p.m. (WITH ORCHESTRA).

The 'St. John' Passion	Bach
-------------------------------	------

As a sequel to the highly successful fortnightly organ recitals at St. Mary Redcliff, Bristol, St. Thomas Church (City) decided to give recitals on alternate Mondays, which have been attended by very large congregations. Mr. R. T. Morgan, of St. Mary Redcliff, was the player on February 16, and selected his programme from Handel, Martini, and Saint-Saëns. A Toccata by Arthur Baynon, a Bristolian, was also in the programme. Mr. Eric Luton contributed several violoncello solos. A Bristol organ, that at old King Street Baptist Chapel, in which, among other improvements, tubular pneumatics replace the old tracker action, was re-opened by Mr. Charles Stear on February 24.

Dr. Alan Gray's recitals in Trinity College Chapel during Lent term are, as usual, an interesting blend of good things old and new. We are glad to see that the whole of Bach's 'Little Organ Book' is to be played, in groups arranged according to the Church's seasons. Dr. Gray gives a short lecture on each programme in the Choir Vestry half an hour before playing. It is through such methods as these that fine organ music will eventually meet with the appreciation it deserves.

Villages with a population of four hundred to five hundred inhabitants are generally poorly catered for chorally. Childe Okeford, in Dorset, is an exception. Not only is it blessed with a flourishing choral Society, but its activities in the matter of Church music leave some much larger centres far behind. On Maundy Thursday the choir will sing 'The Crucifixion,' and on Easter Day Wesley's 'Blessed be the God and Father,' Smart's 'Te Deum in F,' and Garrett's 'Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in F.'

'Messiah' was sung at St. Edward's Parish Church, Romford, Essex, on March 15, by an augmented choir of fifty voices. The soloists were Miss Joan Cross, Madame Mabel Hammond, Mr. Fred P. Hammond, and Mr. Cyril J. Whipps. Mr. H. Alden (organist of St. Lawrence, Upminster) presided at the organ, and Mr. A. C. Chappell-Haverson (organist of St. Edward's) conducted.

In the Parish Church at Calne, Wilts, on February 17, 'St. Paul' was sung by the Musical Society, with orchestra and organ, conducted by Mr. W. R. Pullett.

ORGAN RECITALS

- Mr. Matthew Kingston, St. Luke's, Hampstead (three recitals)—Meditation, Elgar; Overture, 'The Naiades'; Madrigal, Lemare; Prière et Berceuse, Guilmant.

- Mr. J. A. Meale, Central Hall, Westminster (four recitals)—Sonata da Camera, Peace; Scherzo in G minor, Bossi; Marche Héroïque, Lemare; Variations, Hull; Arcadian Idyll, Lemare.

APPOINTMENTS

- Mr. Thomas D. Huxley, organist and choirmaster, Frodsham Parish Church, Cheshire.
- Mr. S. Webster, organist and choirmaster, St. Luke's, Liverpool.
- Mr. Harold Wilkinson, organist and choirmaster, St. Wilfrid's, Bradford.
- Mr. C. H. Wood, organist and choirmaster, Grahamstown Cathedral.

The committee of the League of Peace and Freedom announces six concerts of chamber music to be held at the West Central Jewish Girls' Club on Friday evenings from April 9 to May 14. The British works chosen for performance are the Romance from B. J. Dale's Suite for viola and pianoforte (Mr. Raymond Jeremy and Madame Lily Henkel), and John Ireland's second Violin Sonata (Mr. Ernest Whitfield and Mr. Arthur Alexander).

New Music

BY WILLIAM CHILD
SONGS

Among the most promising of our composers cut off by the war was the young organist Bristow Farrar. He had shown a genuine talent in many fields, and though his flights were mostly short, they were undoubtedly flights. There was nothing pedestrian about his music. His delightful song 'Brittany' was a good example of his ability to produce a real impression by simple means. The same happy skill is shown in his Two Pastorals, 'Come you, Mary,' and 'Who would Shepherd pipes forsake?' just published under one cover by Novello. They are settings of poems by Norman Gale, and the combination is of the happiest. Both are genuine love-songs, but there are neither storms nor languor in them—just a kind of homely grace with a hint of real feeling beneath.

'Come you, Mary, there's a dear!
Mind no more the plaguy dairy!
Milk can never match your white—
Come you, Mary!'

This is the light-hearted note in both, and the music fits like a glove. The songs are not difficult, but call for a dainty style in singer and accompanist. Given that, they will make an instant appeal. Two keys—medium and high.

A very different type of love-song is Harold Rhodes's setting of Mrs. Browning's 'A Woman's Love' (Novello). Here a more declamatory vocal part and a varied and well laid out accompaniment fully express the fervour of the poem. An excellent feature is the care shown in the matter of verbal accentuation, the result being a freedom of rhythm that has much to do with the expressive quality of the song. It is fairly difficult, and calls for a high voice.

The same composer's 'An Evening Confession' (Novello) is that all-too-rare thing, a really original sacred song. The words are a translation by Newman from St. Gregory Nazienzen. Mr. Rhodes's music is of the right breadth and dignity, with one or two daring modulations. Here, as in the song reviewed above, he gets well away from the conventional square rhythm that wrecks so many lyrics. Very impressive are the middle section, with its finely marching bass, and the close, which gives scope for a voice with good low notes. Throughout it needs a real bass singer to do it justice. 'An Evening Confession' would serve admirably for use at organ recitals. The accompaniment is easily adapted to the organ.

H. Claiborne Dixon's 'March Song' (Novello) is on frankly popular lines. It has, however, a merit none too common in popular songs—a really good swinging tune, with a rhythm vigorous, as becomes a march, and yet saved from being commonplace by an occasional hold-up. A rousing baritone would be well suited with it.

A dainty affair is W. McNaught's 'The Piper' (Novello). Some fanciful words by Patrick Chalmers are provided with a tune that has much of the character of folk-song, with the modest compass of an octave. The pianoforte part is appropriately simple, being almost entirely in three-part harmony. Simple as it is, however, it says a great deal. A very happy touch is the delicate accompaniment at the commencement of the second verse. 'The Piper' (which is published in three keys) is further evidence of the composer's ability to write good light music.

Paul Corder is a composer of whom we have heard too little of late. His 'Four Sea Songs' (Enoch) are very vivid and original settings of poems by Masfield. All have the advantage of tunes of the right racy quality, with accompaniments abounding in suggestive touches. There is rough humour in 'Hell's Pavement' and 'Captain Stratton's Fancy,' and genuine pathos in 'The Turn of the Tide' and 'The Emigrant,' so the temperamental singer is well provided for. The songs are published in album form, and are for bass or baritone.

Publishers do not often break out into composition. Winthrop Rogers is one of the select band, and one of the fewer still who can claim serious attention. His 'Old Floyd Ireson' and 'To a Waterfowl' are first-rate songs. Thoroughly modern in style, they are not for every palate.

especially the former, a powerful setting of words by Whittier that do not at first sight appear to lend themselves to musical purposes. They describe the tarring and feathering of a hardhearted old sailor who left a shipload of fellow townsmen to drown. The music is brutal and fierce, and would be thrilling sung by a high voice 'all out.' There is scope for fine, soft singing in the passages that treat of the drowning. A good pianist is necessary.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC

Excellent teaching material are Nos. 69, 74, and 75 of the Chester Series (J. & W. Chester). The first contains ten short pieces by Rebikoff, moderately difficult, and requiring fancy rather than technique. Unambitious as they are, however, the best of them contain matter that will interest players far beyond the modest stage of those to whom the work is addressed. The other albums contain little pieces by C. P. E., W. F., and J. C. F. Bach. They are very slight in texture, and are suitable for elementary players. There is a Preface in French and English, and the ornaments are fully explained.

Alec Rowley's Georgian Suite (Winthrop Rogers) consists of three pieces—Air, Hornpipe, and Jig. Whether Mr. Rowley means to suggest the period of the Four Georges or the present time is not quite clear. The style at the start makes us think of the former, in which case some modern touches later on seem rather out of the picture. However, it is possible to be too precise in such cases, so I pass on to say that the pieces are thoroughly attractive, and would make grateful recreative work for a fairly advanced pupil. The composer has adopted colloquial English for his directions. 'Just in a jovial manner' is one quite in the Percy Grainger vein.

To that racy composer Cyril Scott dedicates his 'English Waltz' (Elkin), a brilliant piece that will appeal to many who are left cold (or irritated) by the nebulosities that we usually get from Mr. Scott. It is rather difficult, and should be a popular item in the lighter side of recital programmes.

The reviewer is in a fix when faced by work from a composer who although still a youth has been hailed in print by a repetition of Schumann's 'Hats off, gentlemen! a genius!' He does not wish to appear grudging, and yet he may have doubts as to the wisdom of the salutation. Is it good for a young composer to be so hailed? Be that as it may, one need have no hesitation in saying that in William Baines we have a pianoforte writer who shows remarkable talent. I recently reviewed in these columns a lengthy work from his pen, 'Paradise Gardens,' and was struck by the resourcefulness of his treatment of the keyboard. Had I known that the composer was a mere lad, and practically self taught, my commendation would have been blended with astonishment. Here is a set of Seven Preludes (Elkin) in which his gifts are quite as fully shown, though the essays are much shorter. There is a decided hint of Scriabin here and there, and it is easy to see that Chopin has a high place in Mr. Baines's young affections. But there is so much originality that one does not feel disposed to dwell unduly on the imitative side which is inevitable in such early work. We must keep our eyes on this youth, hoping—indeed, expecting—soon to be able to join Dr. Hull in his cry of 'Hats off!'

Letters to the Editor

PURCELL PERFORMANCES

SIR,—One of the most curious anomalies in English musical matters is the fact that while we agree as to the greatness of Henry Purcell, and give his Church music something like its due place in our Cathedrals, hardly any attention is given to his secular works, with the exception of an occasional performance of a few songs.

Infrequent performances of one or two of Purcell's works are not an adequate recognition of his genius, and the only way would seem to be the establishment of a Purcell Performing Society to produce the works from time to time. Such a scheme might be extended by including other compositions worthy of association with Purcell, and thereby an important step would be taken towards the encouragement of English opera.

I shall be glad to receive the names of those who are in agreement with this suggestion, with a view to an early attempt to put the matter into a practical form.—Yours, &c.,
F. A. HADLAND.

'A NEW FINGERIT ORGANEIST.'

SIR,—Will you allow me space in which to reply to Dr. Grattan Flood's comments on my article under above title, which unfortunately escaped my attention too long for an answer to be in time for your March issue?

(1.) The date 1250 is not that of the introduction of the organ into Scotland, but of its first recorded use; and the comparison drawn is between what was the fact in Scotland and what, by 'most Englishmen—and even Scotchmen themselves,' was commonly supposed to be the fact. To say that Scotland was 'more advanced' than certain historians realise involves no comparison with England at all. And if Dr. Grattan Flood will re-read his own first paragraph carefully he will see that there is no contradiction whatever between the facts he states and the sentence he quotes from me.

(2.) In thanking him for the additional instances he gives of the simultaneous use of the lute and organ, I must point out that my use of the word 'unique' was qualified. He quotes it as though it was absolute.

(3.) Dr. Grattan Flood says that the Van der Goes panel is 'now in Buckingham Palace.' This is not the case. It is now in Holyrood Palace, and (except for temporary removals) has been there since 1857, when it was removed from Hampton Court. Apparently it never was in Buckingham Palace, though it was once in Kensington Palace. I have seen it at Holyrood several times myself during the last quarter of a century—for instance, last August, when I obtained the photograph so excellently reproduced in your January number. Dr. Grattan Flood further says that 'the Provost is represented as kneeling before St. Cecilia, who is playing the organ.' This also is not the case. The Provost is at the player's left hand, and has his back towards him (or her). The position strikes one at once as peculiar. The explanation is that if the folding panels were closed the Provost would appear as worshipping the Holy Trinity, represented on the corresponding panel. The angel at the organ is identified by Mr. David Laing as representing the deceased Queen, Mary of Gueldres. Sir Herbert Maxwell calls this 'an ingenious conjecture.' Neither he nor Mr. James Caw, both high authorities, mention St. Cecilia.

Sir J. G. Dalzell's reproduction, which of course I have seen, is not in my opinion a whit better than that reproduced, by Royal permission, in your columns.—Yours, &c.,

CLEMENT ANTROBUS HARRIS.

Obituary

ODOARDI BARRI had been so long out of the limelight that his death in the last days of January passed unnoticed save for an account in the Kensington Post, yet this forgotten Irish composer deserves recognition if only for his once enormously popular ballad 'The Boys of the Old Brigade,' which he composed for his compatriot Signor Foli in 1874. Curiously enough both of these Irishmen Italianised their names, as Barri's real name was Slater, while Foli's was Foley. Born in Dublin on September 13, 1844, Edward Slater showed an early aptitude for music, and was sent as a boy to Rome, where he studied singing and joined an opera company. He fought as a Papal Zouave in defence of the Holy See, and then settled for seven years at Malta under the patronage of Sir Patrick Grant, whose wife was the daughter of the famous Irish soldier Viscount Gough, G.C.B. In 1872 he went to America, and narrowly escaped with his life in the great fire of Chicago. Returning to England he became reader for Cramer & Co., in succession to Sullivan, and composed numerous songs, including 'The Shadow of the Cross,' 'The River and the Maiden,' 'The Land of Dreams,' 'The Good Shepherd,' 'The Dream Flower,' 'The Shilling,' &c. He passed away at Fitzroy Street, London, at the age of seventy-five.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

A students' chamber concert took place on Wednesday afternoon, March 10, in the Duke's Hall. The programme opened with Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concerto in G, for strings, played by the Junior Orchestra under Mr. Spencer Dyke—a movement from Dvorák's String Quartet (Op. 106) and one from Beethoven's Quartet (Op. 18, No. 4) coming later in the concert. The solo items included Prelude and Gavotte from Bach's Sonata for violin in E, played by Mr. Cecil M. White, Wieniawski's Romance and Rondo, played by Master Israel Schlaen, Chopin's Fantasia Impromptu (Mr. Alan Bush), and Nocturne in B flat minor (Miss Irene Hyman), and Albeniz's 'Triana' (Mr. Reginald Paul). Several songs, including 'Agnus Dei' by Bizet and 'Sea Wrack' by Hamilton Harty, completed the programme.

On Thursday and Friday, March 18 and 19, the students gave two performances of Goring Thomas's comedy-opera 'The Golden Web.' The opera was produced under the direction of Mr. Cairns James and Mr. Henry Beauchamp. The usual terminal orchestral concert took place at Queen's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, March 23, when several items of more than ordinary interest were heard. The programme opened with the performance of a MS. Overture, 'As you like it,' by Mr. Paul Kerby, holder of the Carl Rosa Scholarship and a young composer of very considerable promise. Miss Doris Hobson played the Variations from Glazounov's Pianoforte Concerto, Op. 92, and Miss Norah Blaney two movements from Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor. The other items included Saint-Saëns's Violoncello Concerto (Miss Lilly Phillips), the first movement of Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto (Master Jean Pougnet), Prologue from 'Pagliacci' (Leoncavallo), Liszt's 'Loreley,' and the Dialogue from Parry's 'Judith.'

Mr. Benjamin J. Dale, Mr. W. H. Reed, and Mr. William Wallace have recently been elected Fellows of the R.A.M.

The Sterndale Bennett Prize (pianoforte) has been awarded to Lillian W. Southgate (a native of London), Denise Lassimonne being very highly commended. The adjudicators were Mrs. Blanche Levi, Mrs. A. Mabel Heasman, and Miss Margaret Bennett (in the chair).

The Goldberg Prize (singing) has been awarded to Roy D. Russell (a native of Anerley), Leonard F. Hubbard being very highly commended. The adjudicator was Mr. John Booth.

The Midsummer Term begins on Thursday, April 22. As the Academy is so full, no further students can be accepted before September. Consequently the usual entrance examination in April will not be held.

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of April, 1860:

A PROFESSIONAL YOUNG LADY, accustomed to lead a Choir or Congregation, wishes for a re-engagement. Address, C.E.C., care of Mr. Novello, 35, Poultry.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL.—The second concert of the London Quintett Union took place on the 14th of March. The vocal performers were Miss Banks and Madame Sainton-Dolby. The former sang Mozart's aria, "Parto," from La Clemenza di Tito with clarinet obligato by Mr. Maycock; and the latter sang an air from Handel's Admetus—in addition to which each lady sang a ballad. The instrumentalists were Messrs. Willy Westlake, Webb, Pettit, Reynolds, and Maycock. . . . A quaint trio, by Professor Bennett, was also much admired, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. The effect of the two latter instruments being employed with a pizzicato movement was pretty enough.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL AND THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY. . . . It is stated that while the total number of visitors to the Handel Festival in 1857 was 48,414, in 1850 the numbers were 81,260, thus made up:—Saturday, Rehearsal, 19,680; Monday, the Messiah, 17,109; Wednesday, Te Deum, 17,644; Friday, Israel in Egypt, 26,827,—so that there was an increase of 32,846 persons in 1859 over 1857. The pecuniary results in 1859 were no less gratifying, as the following extract will show:—"Total receipts, £34,913 12s. 9d.; total expenditure by the Sacred Harmonic Society and the Crystal Palace Company, £16,003 7s. 8d.; balance, £18,910 5s. 1d. Including the property acquired by the two bodies,—the Crystal Palace Company, in the unrivalled orchestra and fittings—the Sacred Harmonic Society, in music available for future festivals, musical instruments, &c.—and the cash balances carried to their respective accounts, the profits of the two festivals may be stated to amount to the large sum of £34,000.

COMIC SONG—THE RIFLE FEVER, by H. WALKER (with a humorous illustration). Price 2s.

ALL IS LOST, arranged as a Pianoforte Duet, in a familiar style, by A. MULLEN. Price 2s.

GIVE ME MY DEAR SUNNY LAND IN THE SOUTH. Ballad. The poetry by M. E. BERRY; the music by J. W. CHERRY. Price 2s.

Music in the Provinces

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS)

BELFAST

Musical activity has been very marked here during February and March. Since the concert on February 14 (mentioned in our March issue) several notable music-makings have been held. Chief among these, on February 16, was the appearance of the Beecham Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Albert Coates conducting, when Belfast musicians and music-lovers had a treat such as they had not known for a long time. The first part of the programme was of Wagner numbers, while the second part comprised Cyril Scott, Liadoff, and Scriabin. The selection was admirable, although there were probably not many auditors who could honestly say that they appreciated the 'Poème de l'Extase' of the last-named composer. Miss Edna Thornton was the vocalist. Mr. Peter Dawson, although announced, did not appear.

Another fine concert of the Quinlan series took place on February 25, with a brilliant array of talent including Misses Caroline Hatchard and Astra Desmond, Messrs. Lenghi Cellini and Peter Dawson, and Madame Renée Chemet (violin).

On March 4 the Winifred Burnett Quartet gave a charming concert of chamber music, presented by women artists. The quartet comprised Mesdames Burnett, E. Valentine, E. Harper, and C. Taylor. Mrs. John Seeds was the vocalist, Mrs. Herbert Warnock was the pianist, and Mrs. Herbert Nixon accompanied. The songs were by Debussy, John A. Carpenter, Haydn, Scarlatti, Hardebeck, and Schubert—a sufficiently catholic selection. Elgar's Pianoforte and Violin Sonata and Pianoforte Quintet, Op. 84, were among the most enjoyable items in a refined programme.

The Railway Benevolent Concert on March 5 brought a number of leading artists, viz., Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Carmen Hill, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Harry Dearth, and Miss Marjorie Hayward (violin). Detailed notice of the works performed would be superfluous.

The Belfast Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, grows steadily in proficiency and popularity, affording encouraging proof of local progress in musical culture. At the concert on March 6 Captain Horace Stevens was the vocalist, and Miss Carrodus Taylor solo violoncellist. The orchestra was heard in the Prelude to Act 3 of 'Lohengrin,' the Overture to 'Tristan and Isolde,' 'Entrance of the Gods into Walhalla' ('Rheingold'), and the Prelude to Act 3 of 'The Meistersingers.'

The sixth orchestral concert of the Belfast Symphony Orchestra (Mr. E. Godfrey Brown conductor), which was given on March 20, brought the series to a close. The soloists were Miss Clytie Hine, who delighted the audience with songs of Mascagni, Wagner, Arne, and Purcell, and Mr. John Chine, who was much appreciated in clarinet solos. The Orchestra played a varied selection comprising the March from 'Prince Igor,' Stanford's 'Irish Rhapsody,' the 'Unfinished' Symphony, the 'Bartered Bride' Overture, Holbrooke's 'Variations on an Old English Air,' and the 'Entrance of the Gods' ('Rheingold').

The Philharmonic Society's season closed with a fine performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' on March 19, the soloists being Miss Ethel Dyer and Messrs. John Coates, Charles Knowles, and James F. Newel.

BIRMINGHAM

Mr. Mathew Stevenson's fine series of Orchestral Concerts is gradually growing in favour, and is certainly entitled to rank among the great features of our busy musical season. The excellent support given to the concert at the Town Hall on February 12 was doubtless due to the presence of M. Mischa-Leon, Miss Olga Haley, and the local pianist Miss Rosemary Savage. The orchestral programme was somewhat restricted, and with such an excellent array of fine instrumentalists one would have been glad if some symphonic work had been given. The principal orchestral items were Wagner's Funeral March and Siegfried's 'Journey to the Rhine,' from 'Götterdämmerung'; Borodin's Overture to 'Prince Igor,' and March from the same opera; and Moussorgsky's 'Gopak.' Madame Olga Haley's fine singing enlisted the greatest admiration. M. Mischa-Leon sang the Prize Song from the 'Mastersingers,' and three English songs that completely held the audience. The pianoforte soli chosen by Miss Rosemary Savage were scholarly and intelligently interpreted. Mr. Stevenson had the orchestra under complete control.

The Midland Musical Society's concert given at the Town Hall on February 14, under its painstaking and capable conductor, Mr. A. J. Cotton, was of more than ordinary interest, inasmuch as the programme contained Beethoven's Mass in C and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' a crucial test for any choir. The chorists infused the right character, tone-power, and phrasing into their fine ensemble. Miss Helen Anderton's rich contralto voice was once more heard to advantage in an excerpt from Bach, and Miss Dorothy Freeman sang pleasingly Senta's Ballad from 'The Flying Dutchman.' The orchestra was quite efficient and well-balanced. Variety was given to the programme by the inclusion of Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite—not a perfectly appropriate choice.

The Hytch String Quartet (Messrs. Arthur Hytch, Frank Cantell, Harold Mills, and Frederick Boze) gave the first of two chamber concerts at the Midland Institute on February 19. Mr. Hytch is an excellent leader of considerable experience in the domain of chamber music, and he and his colleagues gave a vivid and quite artistic performance of Haydn's Quartet in G, one of the most taking of all Haydn's string quartets. They were also successful in Tchaikovsky's famous Quartet in D, Op. 11, which contains the lovely Andante Cantabile. English composers were represented by some short folk-tune movements composed by Frank Bridge, Julius Harrison, and Percy Grainger.

Mr. Hubert Brown's concert given at the Midland Institute on February 21 was of a popular order, but good of its kind, the principal attractions being Miss Perceval Allen and Mr. Alfred Heather. Mr. Percival Hodgson contributed some violin solos in excellent style, and our local baritone, Mr. Alfred Askey, Miss Dorothy Henning (pianoforte), Miss Audrey Evans (violoncello), Mr. U. H. Ridge (reciter), and the concert-giver as accompanist completed an efficient group of artists.

To Mr. Appleby Matthews we owe the first Birmingham performance of Edward German's 'Theme and Six Diversions,' given at the Futurist Theatre on February 15. The work was greatly appreciated, and will shortly be repeated. He also gave for the first time here Granville Bantock's 'Overture to a Greek Tragedy,' first produced at the Worcester Festival of 1911. It is an earnest and appealing work, rich in tone-colouring and expressive moods.

Of considerable interest was Mr. Hubert Brown's concert that took place at the Midland Institute on February 28. He was fortunate in securing Mr. Benham, a notable pianist, who joined Mr. Howard Rutter (violin) in a fine reading of Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' Sonata. For his pianoforte solos Mr. Benham selected Schumann's 'Carnaval,' Liszt's Transcriptions of Schubert's 'Erl-King,' and Wagner's 'Spinning Song' from 'The Flying Dutchman.' The vocalist was Miss Mabel Manson.

At the Midland Institute, on February 28, the Birmingham Bach Society, founded by Mr. Bernard Jackson, produced Bach's 'Coffee' Cantata, also the 'Peasants' Cantata and 'Phœbus and Pan.' There was a small orchestra of strings, flute, and pianoforte, conducted by Mr. Bernard Jackson, and the vocalists were Miss Emily Broughton and Mr. Arthur Cranmer, two of our best local singers.

Coleridge-Taylor's 'A Tale of Old Japan' has already been given by the Birmingham Choral Union on various occasions, and once more this charming work was included at their concert in the Town Hall on March 6. Choir and orchestra are now quite familiar with the work, and their expression, fine tone-quality, and general grasp of rhythmic art helped to make the performance the best yet given under Mr. Richard Wassell's conductorship; indeed, he infused a great deal of spirit and dramatic effect into the task he undertook. In addition, the principal artists—Miss Emily Broughton, Miss Elsie Morgan, Mr. Sydney Halliley, and Mr. James Howell—contributed a well-chosen selection of songs.

The last concert in aid of the National Institute for the Blind was given at the Town Hall on Sunday evening, March 7, again arranged by Mr. Sidney Stoddard. With the exception of Miss Joan Willis's excellently played violoncello solos, the programme was made up of songs, variety being imparted by the introduction of some finely delivered dramatic recitations by Miss Katrina Lund. The vocalists included Miss Lilly Aston, Miss Madge Priest, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Sidney Stoddard. A great success was achieved by Mr. John Coates, who was in excellent form.

Mr. Mathew Stevenson's Orchestral Concert, which took place at the Town Hall on March 8, was principally noteworthy on account of the inclusion in the programme of the Transformation scene Grail music from 'Parsifal.' Much of its success must be attributed to Mr. C. W. Perkips's magnificent playing of the organ part, which was substituted for the choral contingent. The presentation was deeply interesting, and showed Mr. Mathew Stevenson's keen appreciation of Wagner. The Overture to the 'Flying Dutchman,' the 'Prelude and Liebestod' from 'Tristan and Isolde,' Debussy's Prelude 'L'après-midi d'un Faune,' and Chabrier's Rhapsody 'España' were also items in the programme. The vocalist was Miss Doris Vane, an artist gifted with a full and sympathetic voice which she uses with perfect art. Pianoforte solos were played by Miss Mildred Langley in a somewhat conventional manner. Miss Vera Beringer gave a dramatic recitation.

Mr. Appleby Matthews and his well-trained choir gave a concert of British Choral Music at the Town Hall on March 9. The great novelty was Granville Bantock's 'Pageant of Human Life,' a musical setting of verses by Sir Thomas More. In addition to the choir, a number of children from the Acocks Green Council School, so ably trained by Miss Ford, rendered excellent help, the young female voices sounding fresh and pleasing. To form a decided opinion upon Granville Bantock's work it is necessary to hear it again, as the writing presents difficulties which at a first performance were hardly mastered. The choir was of course quite safe in Elgar's unaccompanied part-songs, which have often been sung on previous occasions. The children's choir was heard to advantage in Schubert's 'To Sylvia' and Dunhill's 'A lake and a fairy boat.' The finest singing of the evening was heard in Wesley's 'In exitu Israel,' where the whole body of singers realised magnificent tone and power. Violin solos were played by the talented young violinist, Miss Margaret Fairless, and Miss Doris Watkins contributed some pianoforte solos.

The last Hubert Brown concert of the season, given at the Town Hall on March 11, was devoted to a pianoforte recital by Mark Hambourg, who was in excellent form. Miss Anne Thursfield assisted with a number of songs.

A concert recital of Edward German's popular opera 'Tom Jones' was given by the Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association, conducted by Mr. Joseph H. Adams. The choir and orchestra were quite familiar with the score, and the result achieved reflected great credit on the executants. The important parts assigned to the principals were admirably sustained by Madame Parkes-Darby, Miss Kathleen Miller, Mr. James Howell, and Mr. Herbert Simmonds.

At the last International Celebrity Concert of the season, held at the Town Hall on March 16, Vladimir de Pachmann gave a Chopin recital which greatly delighted the large audience present.

BOURNEMOUTH

Attractions of various kinds at the Symphony Concerts are still well to the fore, the répertoire of the Municipal Orchestra appearing to be as inexhaustible as ever. The wealth of fine orchestral music, both well-known and unfamiliar, that is produced in this town is almost inconceivable, and so long as the civic fathers continue their present enterprising policy of encouragement to music, for so long will Bournemouth's reputation for artistic attractiveness be secure. On the other hand, it is equally clear that any drastic curtailment of the municipality's musical activity would considerably damage local material interests. Shorn of its orchestra, Bournemouth might easily descend to the level of the traditional Slocum-sur-Mer.

Any, too, who despair of ever catching glimpses of a musical progressiveness in this country—and such persons are to be found—should cast a roving eye towards the Bournemouth Symphony Concerts. We do not think they would be disappointed. If sufficiently wise to recognise the futility of 'scrapping' all the classic works, surely they would find a few words of praise for the catholicity of the Bournemouth programmes, representative as they are of every age and school. Here, for instance, is the tale of the compositions, both familiar and novelties, that have been played during the past month at the Winter Gardens: Chabrier's 'Gwendoline' Overture and 'España' Rhapsody, Schubert's C major Symphony, Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, Martin Shaw's 'Cockyolly Bird' Overture, Elgar's two Interludes from 'Falstaff,' Scriabin's first Symphony, a new Violin Concerto by G. O'Connor-Morris, Guiraud's 'D'Arteveld' Overture, César Franck's D minor Symphony, Eugène Goossens's 'Four Conceits,' Mozart's D minor Pianoforte Concerto, Smetana's 'Bartered Bride' Overture, Brahms's Symphony in F, Eric Coates's 'Summer Days' Suite, Glazounov's Violin Concerto, Weber's 'Der Freischütz' Overture, Goldmark's Symphony in E flat (No. 2), Gabriel-Marie's Symphonic Sketch, 'En Réve,' and Beethoven's 'Emperor' Pianoforte Concerto. Versatility with artistry and the avoidance of a groove is the policy that Mr. Dan Godfrey consistently advocates.

The orchestral playing throughout the month has reached a uniformly high standard. Especially excellent were the performances of the Scriabin Symphony, the 'Bartered Bride' Overture (in which the precision of the strings was particularly apparent), and Weber's beautiful Overture, played with an expressiveness that even the Bournemouth Orchestra has rarely equalled when interpreting this romantic music.

Good all-round ability, too, has been shown by the recent solo performers. Miss Violet Clarence did not quite explore the depths of the lovely Schumann Concerto, but allowance must be made for the handicap of a pianoforte that was not in perfect order. Mr. Godfrey Ludlow was the introducer of Mr. O'Connor-Morris's new Violin Concerto. The work is a powerful one in many respects, and it was a compliment to Bournemouth that the town should have been selected for its first performance. The composition reveals certain weaknesses in design, but the slow movement is an exceedingly moving piece of writing, while possibly a little structural revision in the other sections would make them fully as effective as the charming middle movement. Mr. Ludlow's performance of the work—which the composer conducted—was facile and resourceful. Nothing more delightful has been heard at the Symphony Concerts this season than Mr. Lloyd Powell's interpretation of the Mozart composition—it was imbued with the very essence of Mozart. The Glazounov Violin Concerto was in the safe hands of Miss Katie Goldsmith, a young performer who reveals much natural ability and an admirable technique. Miss Maud Agnes Winter is a thoroughly sound artist, who vindicated her powers in the formidable 'Emperor' Concerto. She has, however, still one or two defects to subdue, such as, in particular, the inclination to accelerate the time where steadiness is the chief requisite.

BRADFORD

At the Bradford Subscription Concert on February 27, the Hallé Orchestra appeared under its new permanent conductor, Mr. Hamilton Harty, who gave striking evidence of his fitness for the post by his very brilliant and vital performances of Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony and the extract from Delius's opera, 'A Village Romeo and Juliet,' which is known as 'The Walk to the Paradise Garden,' this being a fitting compliment to a composer who, though of foreign extraction, owes his birth to the city of Bradford. Miss Sylvia Nelis was the vocalist. The Bradford Permanent Orchestra, on February 14, followed its excellent custom of recognising living native composers by giving Josef Holbrooke's Pianoforte Concerto based on 'The Song of Gwyn Ap Nudd,' which, with Miss Hilda Lacey as pianist, made a good impression by its abundant fancy and romanticism, that atone for a certain diffuseness of treatment. Very enjoyable was a Suite, 'The Toy Cart,' which the composer, Mr. A. C. Reynolds (who conducted), has compiled from his incidental music to a play. It is unpretentious, lyrical, and graceful, and is very effectively orchestrated. Mr. Julius Harrison conducted, among other things, Mozart's E flat Symphony, and Miss Olga Haley was a vocalist of quite exceptional distinction. The Bradford Festival Choral Society, on March 5, gave a concert chiefly of unaccompanied choral music, its outstanding feature being a very virile performance, under Dr. Bairstow, of Bach's Motet, 'Singet dem Herrn.' Mr. Erik Brewerton played groups of pianoforte pieces by Brahms and Chopin respectively, and Miss Agnes Nicholls was the vocalist. On March 12 the Edgar Drake Quartet played Arnold Trowell's well-written and interesting String Quartet in G (Op. 25), and, with Mr. George Smith as pianist, Dvorák's delightful Pianoforte Quintet. Miss Nellie Judson was the vocalist. It was unfortunate that this event clashed with an exceptionally interesting recital in connection with the Bradford Home Music Study Union, at which a most promising young pianist, Mr. Norman Constantine, played sonatas by Beethoven, Schumann, and Brahms, together with pieces by Oliver King, Ireland, Grovez, and Percy Pitt, an ambitious programme in which the soloist distinguished himself. At the Free Chamber Concert on February 16, Mr. Dunford and Mr. Midgley played Violin Sonatas by Ireland (A minor), Walford Davies (E minor), and Dvorák (F), Miss Alice Moxon being a pleasing vocalist. On March 1, Medtner's Violin Sonata in B minor, which had been heard at a previous concert, was repeated in order that its merit might have a better chance of appreciation. In this and in J. B. McEwen's short Violin Sonata in F minor, Miss Mabel Priestley and Mr. Midgley were the executants. Miss Ida Bellerby was a delightful pianist, and Miss Nellie Judson the vocalist. At the last concert of the series, on March 15, the Edgar Drake Quartet was heard in Elgar's String Quartet, and, with Mr. Midgley as pianist, in Arensky's Pianoforte Quintet. Vaughan Williams's song-cycle 'On Wenlock Edge' was another feature of an exceptionally strong programme, Mr. Anthony Beck being the vocalist. At the last of his organ recitals in All Saints' Church, on March 4, Mr. Charles Stott introduced Reubke's masterly 'Sonata on the 94th Psalm,' one of the most distinguished of modern organ compositions; Miss Kathleen Moorhouse played some violoncello solos, and Mr. W. Lovell was the vocalist.

The Beecham Orchestra visited Huddersfield on February 19, when Mr. Albert Coates gave a fine, poetic reading of Beethoven's seventh Symphony, in which the quality of the orchestra, and especially of the double-basses, was manifested. Madame Renée Chemet played Saint-Saëns's Violin Concerto in B minor in faultless style, and the concert was one of the best ever heard at Huddersfield, making it a matter for regret that it was not better attended. On February 27 the Huddersfield Choral Society gave Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch,' under Dr. Coward. Miss Evans Williams, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Charles Tree were the principals, and during an interval a presentation was made to the conductor, who last November became a septuagenarian, but one whose age cannot be easily reconciled to his extraordinary energy and enthusiasm.

On March 10 the Music Club recital was by Mr. William Murdoch, who, beginning with Bach's Chromatic Fantasia, paid particular attention to contemporary native music, playing pieces by Ireland, Frank Bridge, Cyril Scott, and Julius Harrison, whose 'Four Worcestershire pieces' formed a pleasing novelty.

At Halifax, on March 4, the Choral Society ended a successful but uneventful season with a creditable performance of 'Elijah,' with Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Etty Ferguson, and Messrs. Coltham and Herbert Brown as principals, and Mr. C. H. Moody as conductor. A most promising young pianist, Miss Marion Brearley, gave a recital at Halifax on February 27, and played, with Miss Moorhouse, Beethoven's Violoncello Sonata in A, as well as solo pieces by Chopin, Brahms, and Schubert-Liszt, in which she made a very favourable impression.

BRISTOL

We have had an interesting and varied month at Bristol, with choral, orchestral, and 'great-artist' concerts to satisfy all tastes.

On February 14 a service that took the triple character of festival, rehearsal, and hymn exposition was given by the Bristol branch of the Church Music Society at St. Mary Redcliffe Church. Prof. Walford Davies conducted a lesson for the congregation in singing on quite original lines. Mr. R. T. Morgan acted as organist, and Mr. Hubert W. Hunt conducted the choir. Prof. Davies gave a lecture in the evening on 'Chorus singing' at the Merchant Venturers' Technical College, the audience supplying the choral illustrations.

At Bristol Post Office Benevolent Concert, on February 16, at Victoria Rooms, Mr. Frank Webster, the young D'Oyly Carte tenor, and Mr. Willie Rouse, a London entertainer, brought forward some delightful items.

The Clifton Chamber Concert Party gave their third concert at Victoria Rooms on February 17. The first movement of Schmitt's Quintet in B minor, Warner's 'Phantasy,' Purcell's 'Golden Sonata,' and several pianoforte solos contributed by Mr. Herbert Parsons—who drew upon Debussy for two items—made up an educative programme that concluded with Haydn's Quartet in D, for strings. It was stated that in the building of future programmes suggestions from subscribers would be welcomed and considered.

Miss Dorothy Godwin and Mr. Edward Hawke, well-known harp and violin players, gave a successful recital at Victoria Rooms on February 24. Miss Godwin's principal selection was Pierné's Concerto for harp and pianoforte, in which she played with confidence and strength. Assistance was given by Miss Gertrude Winchester (vocalist) and Miss Ruby Taylor (pianoforte).

The artists at the third Powell 'Celebrity' Concert on February 26 were Madame Clara Butt, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, Miss Rosina Buckman, Miss Adela Verne, and M. Melsa.

The Bristol New Symphony Orchestra, a body of thirty-six all-Bristol musicians, in a little venture promoted by several local enthusiasts has given a series of four concerts at the Empire on Sundays, the only day available, in order to test the desire of the public for the local permanent orchestra Bristol badly needs. Well-chosen programmes have been submitted, starting on February 29, and though hampered by restricted opportunities for rehearsal, the Orchestra has certainly made more than good in such items as Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony and Kalinnikov's G minor Symphony. The attendances have demonstrated increasing interest on the part of the public. There are developments on foot for the establishment of a Bristol professional orchestra, and the project may bear fruit next season.

Mr. Clive Carey and Mr. Steuart Wilson, well-known song recitalists, gave a very artistic performance of classical and modern works before a large audience at Victoria Rooms on March 1. Another highly artistic evening was on March 4, at the same hall, when Mrs. Kennedy Fraser and Miss Patuffa Kennedy Fraser gave an exquisite performance of the fascinating 'Folk-Songs of the Hebrides' collected by the former lady.

Signor Milani, one of the brilliant Continental school of violinists, gave a recital at Victoria Rooms on March 8, in which he showed great technical mastery in several difficult solos.

Kingswood Congregational Choir, numbering with orchestra about a hundred and sixty performers, gave a vigorous and highly creditable performance of 'Elijah' on March 10. Mr. George Riseley, who paid the Choir a visit, congratulated Mr. E. J. Bees upon the excellent singing that he had heard, and, referring with regret to the lack of instrumental concert facilities at Bristol, he foreshadowed an improvement in this direction next winter if he could procure sufficient support.

On March 13 Mr. Riseley directed a performance of 'Elijah' at Colston Hall which fully maintained the reputation of the Bristol Choral Society for work of a high standard. There must have been very nearly four thousand people in the hall, every seat being taken, a popular demonstration that may be regarded as a great tribute to the Society and to its conductor. Miss Carrie Tubbs, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Herbert Brown sang the solo music with fine intensity of feeling. The clean-cut precision and well-balanced tone of the choir were marked features of the performance. There was an excellent band led by Mr. Maney, of London.

CORNWALL

Male Choirs continue to flourish in Cornwall, and their value cannot be over-estimated. Concerts have been given by Stithians Male Choir (Mr. J. H. Bowden), on February 20, at St. Day, and on March 6 at Halwin; Germoe Male Choir (Mr. Pryor) on March 10; St. Ives Male Choir, on February 21, at Porthleven; Mabe Male Choir (the Rev. C. Daly Atkinson), on February 21, at Treverva ('A wet sheet,' 'In this hour,' 'We rock away,' 'The Beleaguered,' 'Shepherd of Souls,' 'O peaceful night,' and 'Hallelujah Chorus'); St. Erth Male Choir, on February 23, at St. Erth; Luxulyan Male-Voice Quartet, on February 24, at Bugle; Gunnislake and District Male Choir (Mr. W. P. Leverton), on March 1, at Bodmin ('Comrades in Arms,' 'In absence,' 'As torrents in summer,' 'Echoes,' 'Soldier's Farewell,' and 'Give me thy heart'); Mousehole Male Choir (Mr. Fred Roach), on March 6, at Tredavoe; and Tincroft Male Choir (Mr. J. C. Uren), on March 6, at Greenbottom.

Truro People's Palace Male Choir gave its first concert since resuscitation on March 12, when the new conductor, Major A. W. Gill, secured excellent renderings of 'When evening's twilight' (Hatton), and Dudley Buck's cantata 'King Olaf's Christmas.' Pendennis Male Choir, formerly conducted by Mr. Tregurtha Williams, has been re-formed with Mr. Viol as conductor.

Of mixed choir performances must be mentioned the cantata 'The Light of Ages' by Calstock Wesleyan Choir on February 10, and the cantata 'The Day of Rest' by Constantine Wesley Choir. 'Messiah' was performed by Launceston Choral Society on February 12, when Mr. C. S. Parsonson, the conductor, completed twenty-five years' service. The choral singing was of a high standard, and a good orchestra was led by Mr. Alfred Serle. The principals were Miss Nellie Stephenson, Miss Joan Ashley, Mr. Aldrovan Maynard, and Mr. A. E. Old.

Loce Choral Society, revived on February 12, sang Stanford's 'The Revenge,' and Gade's 'Erl King's Daughter,' conducted by the Rev. E. A. Saunders. Miss Florence Woolland led the orchestra, and the principal vocalists were Miss Samina Farish, Miss Phyllis Chadney, and Mr. S. J. Bishop. The choir numbered fifty voices, and in attack, light and shade, and finish, the performance was all that could be desired.

Miss Maria Yelland, contralto, gave a concert at St. Austell on February 12, assisted by Miss Harriet Solly, Miss Gertrude Tomalin (elocutionist), and Mr. Joseph Farrington.

Redruth Operatic Society, on March 2-4, gave three performances of 'The Pirates of Penzance,' conducted by Mr. H. Dennis, who also led the orchestra.

COVENTRY AND DISTRICT

The range of concerts given at Coventry during the past six weeks has been typical of the wide field over which the present-day musical activities of the city extend. Performances by local organizations have been particularly numerous, and the vital need of a Town Hall or similar building in which such concerts could be given has been again emphasised.

On February 15 Miss Phyllis Lett paid another visit to the Opera House, and was capably supported by Mr. Edward Isaacs, a pianist of assured ability who made his first appearance locally, and Mr. Douglas Marshall (vocalist). Mr. Marshall, whose choice of songs was unusual, is to be commended upon prefacing the singing of both groups by interesting explanatory remarks.

The following Sunday (February 22) was marked by the appearance of the Portuguese tenor, M. José de Moraes.

For the week commencing February 23 the Coventry Amateur Operatic Society occupied the boards of the Empire Theatre with an excellent presentation of 'The Gondoliers' (Sullivan). Some fine singing was heard from the soloists, and the chorus, which was large, proved very efficient. This year's production added yet another success to a long list of predecessors.

Miss Rosa Dallow (vocalist) was the principal soloist at the Opera House Sunday Concert on February 29.

On March 3, at the Baths Assembly Hall, came the first post-war concert of the Coventry Orchestral Society, happily revived after enforced inactivity since the season of 1915-16. Mr. Herbert R. Clarke, released from military service, again occupied the conductor's desk. The principal feature of the programme was Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, of which the second and fourth movements were given. The 'Leonora' Overture (No. 3) also received a fine interpretation, and other items included Bizet's Suite, 'L'Arlesienne.' The vocalist was Mr. Aubrey Millward.

The following evening, March 4, was the occasion of the third and last concert this season of the Coventry Chamber Music Society. The event took place in St. Mary's Hall, and the programme included Quartets by Schubert (Op. 29, No. 13) and Beethoven (Op. 59, No. 1), and Percy Grainger's 'Molly on the Shore.' The Arthur Hytch String Quartet, which had appeared with success at a previous concert of the Society this winter, once more provided the instrumental music. Miss Alice Vaughan sang 'Fare thee well,' 'Convalescent's Ode to Hope' (Hugo Wolf), 'Elaine's Song,' and 'Tears, idle tears' (F. C. Nicholls).

The Armstrong-Siddeley Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Mathew Stevenson, gave the fifth concert of its season at Parkside on March 6. The programme included the '1812' Overture, Moussorgsky's 'Gopak,' Percy Grainger's 'County Derry Tune,' and the Nocturne from 'A Midsummer Night's Dream.' Major Vernon Brown sang the Prologue to 'Pagliacci,' and two songs by Vaughan Williams.

Miss Sibyl Cropper made her first appearance at the Opera House on March 7.

The Coventry Choral Society, under the leadership of Mr. John Potter, is to be congratulated upon affording the local musical public opportunities for hearing works by local composers. Last year at its mid-Lent concert in Coventry Cathedral the Society gave a sacred cantata, 'The Temptation,' by Mr. F. W. Humberstone (of Coventry). This time (March 8) its selection was a setting of the Stabat Mater by Mr. Frederick Rollason, a Warwickshire musician. Mr. Rollason's comparatively simple score contains effective passages, and light and shade are well contrasted throughout the work. The Society gave a very creditable performance, and good work was secured from the soloists—Mrs. Biddle, Mrs. Burlingham, Mr. L. Moore, and Mr. E. A. Smith. The Cathedral organist, Mr. Walter Hoyle, provided the accompaniments.

Two works previously unheard at Coventry were given by the Coventry Philharmonic Society at its concert in the Empire Theatre on March 9, viz., 'A Tale of Old Japan' (Coleridge-Taylor), and 'The Wedding of Shon Maclean' (Hubert Bath). Mr. Charles Matthews conducted an excellent performance. The choir showed marked improvement in the matter of forte attack. The Oriental atmosphere of the Japanese love-tragedy and the pulsating energy of the heather-hills were well contrasted both by the choir, who sang throughout with sympathy and understanding, and the soloists, Miss Elsie Suddaby, Miss Elsie Chambers, Mr. Frank Webster, and Mr. George Baker. The orchestra played the 'Di Ballo' and 'Fingal's Cave' Overtures.

Mr. S. J. Wisdom, the conductor of the Armstrong-Siddeley Male-Voice Choir, showed happy foresight in arranging a programme that was interesting but not too long, when the third concert of the season took place in the Baths Assembly Hall on March 10. The principal items included 'The Sailors' Chorus' (Parry), 'King of Worlds' (Dard-Janin), 'The Mulligan Musketeers' (Atkinson), 'Down among the Dead Men' (arranged by Bantock), and 'Crossing the Plain' (Price). The soloists were Mr. Charles Morley and Mr. Walter Saul. The latter gave a dramatic reading of 'The Erl-King' (Schubert).

Miss Alice McGowan's students' concert took place in St. Mary's Hall the same evening.

Signor Lenghi Cellini, the Italian tenor, created a most favourable impression upon his appearance at the Opera House on March 14.

The principal musical event of the month at Leamington has been the pianoforte recital by Miss Myra Hess at the Town Hall on March 4. This artist, who was received with enthusiasm, gave a notable interpretation of the Liszt Sonata in B flat minor.

DEVON

Sidmouth Choral and Orchestral Society has been re-formed, and will give 'Messiah' on April 8, conducted by Mr. J. A. Bellamy. Exeter Male Choir (Mr. W. J. Cotton) showed distinct progress on February 11 by its singing of 'Father of heroes' (Callcott), 'Soldier, rest' (O. King), 'Lass of Richmond Hill' (arranged by the conductor), 'Happiest land' (Hatton), 'Vintage song' (Mendelssohn), 'A Franklyn's Dogge' (Mackenzie), 'Strike the lyre' (Cooke), and 'Down in a flowery vale' (Festa). St. Peter's Quartet (Plymouth) sang excellently on February 13, and Barnstaple Y.M.C.A. choir (Mr. A. Long) showed evidence of good training on February 23 in 'Martyrs of the Arena' (Rillé) and 'Give me thy Love' (H. J. Edwards).

Torrington Choral Society does good work in an isolated district, and on February 11 a hundred voices, supported by an orchestra led by Mr. W. Pickard, were conducted by Mr. F. J. Webber in an excellent programme. Newton Abbot Wesleyan Choir sang Nichol's cantata, 'Earth and Heaven,' on February 17, conducted by Mr. Coleridge White.

Massed choirs at Barnstaple on February 23 sang very finely, under the direction of Mr. Sydney Harper, in selections from 'Hymn of Praise,' 'Elijah,' and 'The Rose Maiden.' Plymouth Ladies' Choir (Mr. Percy E. Butchers) showed real musical progress on March 10 in Lahee's cantata, 'The Sleeping Beauty,' and in part-songs by Ethel Boyce and Elgar. Assistance was given in the programme by Miss E. White, Miss May Keene, Mr. Peter Dawson (vocalists), and Mr. Egerton Tidmarsh (pianoforte).

The band of the R.M.L.I., Plymouth Division, has again been selected to escort H.R.H. The Prince of Wales on his travels, and has given farewell concerts at Torquay (February 12-16) and Plymouth (February 25), conducted by Mr. P. S. G. O'Donnell. On the latter occasion the band was heard in Howard Carr's Sketches for Orchestra, memorialising 'Three Heroes,' and Handel's first Concerto, with Dr. Harold Lake at the organ.

Dr. Markham Lee gave a lecture-recital at Exeter on February 28 of music by Roger Quilter, Elgar, Coleridge-Taylor, Walford Davies, Balfour Gardiner, Percy Grainger, and by himself. Miss Phyllis Smith (violin) and some vocalists assisted. The only other chamber music event of the month was given by Mr. Harold Rhodes, Miss Marjorie Hayward, and Miss Maud Arnold at Torquay on March 3. A Trio by Arensky, a Phantasie in C minor by Frank Bridge, and Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte Trio were given, also solos by each artist.

In a tour of Devon, directed by Mr. Philip Ashbrooke, a party visited Plymouth, Torquay, and Barnstaple in the week beginning March 7. The artists were Madame Adelina Delines and Mr. Robert Radford (vocalists), Mr. Vivian Langrish (pianoforte), and Miss Katie Goldsmith (violin).

Exeter Amateur Operatic Society, conducted by Mr. Allan Allen, made great success with eight performances of 'Tom Jones' during the week beginning February 14; also during the same week Exmouth Operatic Society gave good performances of 'The Gondoliers.'

DUBLIN

Dr. G. H. P. Hewson, who has been organist of Armagh Cathedral since October, 1916, and who had formerly been assistant-organist at St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, has been appointed organist of St. Patrick's Cathedral in succession to the late Dr. Charles Marchant. This appointment has given very great satisfaction in Dublin musical circles, where Dr. Hewson is well known.

At the conferring of degrees in the theatre of Trinity College, Dublin, on February 17, Mr. Arthur Knox Duff received the degree of Mus. Bac.

Mr. Quinlan is genuinely to be congratulated on having presented the Beecham Orchestra at the Theatre Royal on February 17. A packed and discriminating audience welcomed this magnificent combination under the baton of Mr. Albert Coates. The first part of the programme was devoted to Wagner selections—rather an embarras de richesses—the 'Siegfried Idyll' completely captivating the vast audience. In the second part a novelty was presented by Mr. Cyril Scott in the shape of two Passacaglias founded on Irish airs, 'The Famine Song' and 'The Poor Irish Boy' (the latter was taken down by Handel when in Dublin in 1742). These works were well received, albeit the contrapuntal devices were more clever than really melodic. A Scriabin item was a puzzle, although a Dublin newspaper classes this composer as 'the successor of Bach and Beethoven.' Miss Edna Thornton sang with much expression, and was well received in her selection from 'Rienzi.' Mr. Coates was accorded quite an ovation—a regular cad mille faillit.

Miss Rhoda Coghill's pianoforte recital at the Aberdeen Hall, on February 23, was well attended, and gave unstinted pleasure to those who have watched the career of this gifted young pianist since her appearance as a child-prodigy. Miss Jean Nolan contributed songs.

The last Quinlan Concert of the season took place at the Theatre Royal on February 27, with Misses Caroline Hatchard and Astra Desmond, Messrs. Lenghi Cellini and Peter Dawson, and Madame Renée Chemet. Among the vocalists Miss Desmond charmed all by her unaffected singing of Sir John Stevenson's 'Oft in the still night' (which he palmed off on the public as a 'Scotch air'), while Mr. Peter Dawson charmed equally by his interpretation of 'Drink to me only with thine eyes.' Madame Chemet was, however, the bright particular star of the occasion, proving herself an incomparable violinist, especially in her Sarasate selection. The audience fairly revelled in the Quartet from 'Rigoletto,' and the Trio from 'Faust.' Mr. Harold Craxton was an admirable accompanist.

Dr. George H. P. Hewson (the new organist of St. Patrick's Cathedral), and Mr. B. Warburton Rooke, have been appointed professors of the organ in the Royal Irish Academy of Music.

The O'Mara Opera Company concluded a month's successful season at the Gaiety Theatre on March 6; the three most attractive operas were 'Lohengrin,' 'Tannhäuser,' and 'Madame Butterfly.' As conductors, Mr. R. J. Forbes and Mr. W. Hecker were most efficient.

Dr. R. R. Terry gave an interesting lecture in the Theatre of the Royal Dublin Society on March 3, speaking on a subject in which he is particularly well-versed, 'The Mediæval Mind in Music.' His illustrations on the pianoforte were very happy, and he had the advantage of a select choir, under the direction of Miss Culwick, for some quaint items of pre-Reformation days.

A Dublin music shop announces the arrival of a large first consignment of violins, bows, &c., 'direct from the famous firm of Messrs. C. G. Gteir & Sohn, Marknenkirchen, Saxony, the home of the violin-making industry.'

On March 14 began the seven-hundredth anniversary celebrations of St. Patrick's Cathedral, as it was on St. Patrick's Day of the year 1220 that this famous Irish Church was given the status of a Cathedral by Archbishop de Londres. Although Christ Church is the older Cathedral, yet, in 1300, both Cathedrals were regarded as metropolitan, and ever since, Dublin has boasted of two official Cathedrals. The celebrations continued during the week, and the ever-popular 'Breastplate of St. Patrick' was sung on March 17.

Miss Petite O'Hara gave a violin recital at the Gaiety Theatre on March 18, when she played Elgar's beautiful Violin Sonata, also Tartini's Variations, and selections from the modern school, including Debussy. Mr. John Coates was the vocalist, and Miss Annie Lord and Mrs. J. F. Larchet were at the pianoforte. Miss O'Hara's playing was a sheer delight, while Mr. Coates added to his already high reputation.

EDINBURGH

On February 16, at Paterson's Orchestral Concerts, Miss Jelly D'Aranyi was solo violinist in Beethoven's Concerto. The work had not been heard here for many years, and nothing but praise is due to the soloist for her clear and individual reading. The remainder of the programme was on popular lines.

The concluding concert of this series, on February 23, was entirely orchestral, and perhaps the most perfect of the Paterson season. Mr. Landon Ronald gave an excellently balanced reading of Tchaikovsky's sixth Symphony. The second half of the programme contained the 'Flying Dutchman' Overture, the Good Friday music from 'Parsifal,' the 'Siegfried Idyll,' and Introduction, Dance of Apprentices, and Procession of the Masters from 'Die Meistersinger,' all of which received excellent treatment.

The Reid Orchestral Concert on February 21 revealed an interesting programme. Bantock's 'Hebridean' Symphony was performed for the first time at Edinburgh. Miss Patuffa Kennedy Fraser sang a group of Hebridean songs which introduced not only the melodies that form the themes of the Symphony, but created the right atmosphere for appreciating the same. They were sung as an introduction to the Symphony. The idea is recommended to other conductors.

Madame Guilhermina Suggia played with the orchestra Dvorák's B minor Violoncello Concerto at the same concert, and needless to say left nothing to be desired in technique or interpretation.

On February 28, at the same series of concerts, the Bantock Symphony was repeated, and M. Fleury, flautist, was soloist in two seldom-heard works—the third Sonata in D major for flute and figured-bass accompanied on the harp, by General Reid (the founder of the Reid Chair of Music), and the G major Flute Concerto by Mozart. Beethoven's 'Leonora' Overture No. 2 opened the concert, and the 'Leonora' No. 3 formed the concluding number. It is a question if any other audience in the country has had an opportunity for comparing these two Overtures at the same concert. As a solo, M. Fleury contributed 'La Flûte de Pan,' by Debussy.

We have before referred in these notes to Prof. Tovey's enterprise in compiling programmes, and in every case his selection of pieces and his schemes of arrangement have been amply justified by the results.

On March 4 the Reid Orchestra gave an 'invitation' concert, when the programme consisted of Bantock's 'Sappho,' Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Conte-Feerie,' Op. 29, Haydn's hundredth Symphony, and Mendelssohn's Scherzo in G minor.

At the International Celebrity Concert on February 14 the following artists appeared: Madame Clara Butt, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, Miss Rosina Buckman, M. Melsa, and Miss Adela Verne. Miss Grace Torrens was the accompanist.

Mr. Leonard Borwick gave a pianoforte recital on February 21. His programme, in addition to Brahms's F minor Sonata, included selections from Scarlatti, Handel, Leo, Couperin, Graun, Palmgren, Debussy, Ravel, and Liszt.

A new Choral Society, under the baton of Mr. A. M'Pherson, gave its first recital on February 17. The chief item was Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha.' The choir is a well-balanced organization, and presented a very satisfactory reading of the work. Miss Marie Thomson, Miss Chrissie Macfarlane, and Mr. Gordon Brown were the soloists.

Miss Marion Richardson, one of our prominent teachers of singing, gave an excellent recital of vocal music on February 18. She drew upon a wide range of composers, from Purcell to Landon Ronald and Hamilton Harty on the British side, and Mozart, Schubert, Brahms, and Puccini on the classic and operatic side.

On March 1, the Royal Choral Union gave a fine interpretation of Elgar's 'Scenes from the Saga of King Olaf.' Mr. Greenhouse Allt is to be congratulated on the steady advance that the Union is making in tone and articulation. The male section of the choir is not yet back to pre-war standard, but from all points of view 'a fine interpretation' is not too laudatory. The solo parts were in the hands of Madame Nicholls, Mr. Blamey, and Mr. D. Brazell.

GLASGOW

The Choral Union gave Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah' at the thirteenth Classical Concert on February 17. A successful performance has to be recorded, but one naturally wonders why the committee select for performance works written for and so definitely connected with the stage—Bantock's 'Pan' was another instance this season—when there are so many fine choral works available and suitable for bodies like the Choral Union. The soloists—Madame Doris Woodall and Messrs. Frederic Blamey and Robert Watson—sang their parts admirably, the last-named (a local singer who took the baritone parts at short notice) deserving a special word of praise. The accompaniments were played by the Scottish Orchestra, and Mr. Warren T. Clemens conducted with commendable judgment and skill. The last of the Classical Concerts, on February 24, was one of the most enjoyable of the series. No finer reading of the Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan and Isolde' has ever been given here, and on this Mr. Landon Ronald is to be congratulated. Mr. Albert Sammons as solo violinist collaborated in Max Bruch's Violin Concerto in G minor, and the programme included the 'Euryanthe' Overture, and pieces by Mendelssohn and Coleridge-Taylor. The Choral and Orchestral Union's season just ended has been very successful in some respects, notably in the crowded audiences that have been the rule at the Saturday Popular Orchestral Concerts, but the many deviations from the programme-prospectus and a somewhat unfortunate method of taking the plébiscite vote for the last Saturday Concert evoked some adverse criticism.

The smaller musical organizations are now bringing forward the results of their winter's work, and of these the William Morris Choir must first be noticed. The personnel of this choir is quite ordinary, but in the hands of a very competent conductor (Mr. William Robertson) presentations of exacting choral music on the competitive festival standard are readily secured. At the annual concert of the choir on March 11 a large number of attractive part-songs were sung by the Children's Choir, the Male-Voice and Female-Voice Choirs, and the Mixed-Voice Choir. Some groups of pianoforte solos were played by Miss Hilda Saxe.

Hamilton Choral Society, under the experienced direction of Mr. T. S. Drummond, gave two successful concerts on March 10 and 11, presenting an all-British programme which included pieces by Parry, Elgar, Macfarren, and Percy E. Fletcher. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Horace Fellowes's string orchestra, ably supplemented by Mr. Percy Gordon at the organ and Miss E. M. Somerville at the pianoforte. Miss Flora Woodman was the solo vocalist. The annual concert of the Glasgow University Choral Society, conducted by Mr. A. M. Henderson, took place on March 15. The choral numbers in the programme were well within the choristers' powers, and were sung with good effect. Groups of songs, beautifully interpreted by Miss Helen Henschel, and pianoforte solos by Mr. Henderson, completed an enjoyable evening's music. Mr. R. L. Reid's Music Classes at the Young Men's Christian Association (in abeyance during the war) brought their session to a close by a performance of 'Messiah' on March 15. The solo music was given by local singers, and Mr. W. J. Clapperton played the organ accompaniments. On the same evening a vocal recital was given by Miss Denne Parker, who sang most artistically a large number of songs representative of different periods. The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company is fulfilling a two months' engagement at the Theatre Royal, playing its repertory to large audiences.

HASTINGS

On Shrove Tuesday we heard some superb playing from Mr. John Dunn, when he was associated with Mr. Julian Clifford in a striking exposition of Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto. The same concert introduced Rimsky-Korsakov's astonishing Capriccio Espagnol. A few days later Miss Fanny Davies appeared. She was inimitable in the 'Emperor' Concerto, and in some solos by Schumann and Brahms, bringing forward also a captivating Allegretto by Josef Suk. Mr. Albert Sammons played Max Bruch's well-worn Violin Concerto on February 28, when we were sorry to hear such fine playing marred by a newly-acquired vibrato. All else was as perfect as ever, and the Max Bruch lived again in his hands.

Besides Mr. Clifford's highly-finished readings of the 'Pastoral' Symphony and Tchaikovsky in E minor at the symphony concerts, he has awakened intense interest in Rimsky-Korsakov by a truly-inspired performance of the 'Scheherazade,' while Glazounov's 'Une Fête Slav' and 'Moyen Age' evoked unbounded admiration. Elgar's 'Enigma Variations,' too, were singularly well-played. Liszt's 'Danse Macabre,' for pianoforte and orchestra, found a gifted exponent in Miss Maud Agnes Winter. Liapounov's Rhapsody, for the same combination, found in the hands of Mr. William Lindsay an executant who was perhaps a little over-conscientious. Miss Rita Neve introduced Holbrooke's 'Gwyn-ap-Nudd' for pianoforte and orchestra; but all her dashing delivery failed to make the work really enjoyable. Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto demands rather more fastidious playing than it received at the hands of Mr. Ernest Whitfield; though, with more experience, his big tone ought to win him a place among violinists.

The numerous schools here evinced their keenness for Mr. Clifford's orchestral propaganda when he gave a lecture on 'The Orchestra' with illustrations by his own players. Subsequently many excellent essays poured in as a result of the educational value of a municipal orchestra. An amateur body of players, conducted by Mr. Julian Clifford, jun., performed a Haydn Symphony and other things to the credit of themselves and their conductor on March 9.

Stainer's 'Crucifixion' is being heard at nearly every church, the best presentations so far being at Christ Church and St. John's. Interesting recitals have been given at Christ Church by Mr. Allan Biggs and Dr. Speer.

LEEDS

The most delightful concert Leeds has enjoyed during this busy season has been, beyond a doubt, provided by the visit of the Beecham Orchestra, under Mr. Albert Coates, at the last of the Quinlan Concerts, on February 20. It is not often that we have the chance of hearing a first-rate orchestra in a thoroughly rehearsed programme and under a conductor who is so fine an artist as Mr. Coates. He gave a masterly and entirely sympathetic reading of Brahms's first Symphony, in which he made every point tell, yet without the least over-emphasis. He is not one of those conductors who search for effects for their own sake; his effects are there, but they come as a means of expression, and one feels with him that he is not a mere virtuoso, but an interpreter. In Stravinsky's 'L'Oiseau de Feu' Suite, we had an opportunity of realising what Mr. Coates can do with the most advanced type of music, and here again he was completely successful. Madame Renée Chemet, in Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' confirmed the impression that she is a worthy successor to Sarasate, and Mr. Peter Dawson was a somewhat unnecessary, but quite satisfactory, vocalist. The Leeds Philharmonic Society has, in this its Jubilee season, been unusually active. On February 18 it gave, under Dr. Bairstow, a vivacious performance of Berlioz's 'Faust,' in which the big choruses—notably 'Faust's Dream'—were very finely sung, and Miss Rosina Buckman, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Herbert Brown were all very happy in their respective characters, Mr. Samuel Mann making the most of Brander's ungrateful part. On March 6 the Society gave a concert, the bulk of which was devoted to Wagner—a lengthy extract from Act 3 of 'Meistersinger,' and shorter pieces from 'Lohengrin,' 'Die Walküre,' and 'Parsifal.' The 'Meistersinger' selection showed how unfitted a large chorus is for such a task, and without the action the humour of the drama missed fire, although the various solo parts were ably sustained by Messrs. Alfred Heather, Frederic Austin, Plunket Greene, and Samuel Mann. One of the most enjoyable things in the programme was James Dear's cycle of 'Songs of the Open Air,' which, though they may owe something to Stanford, are most delightful and effective pieces, full of swing and well-contrasted. Mr. Plunket Greene was at his best in these, and infused great vitality into his reading. On March 17 the Society gave a purely orchestral concert, at which Mr. Albert Coates conducted the Hallé Orchestra in a programme that included Scriabin's third Symphony, 'The Divine Poem,' and a couple of Wagner pieces, while Madame Suggia was heard in violoncello concertos by Lalo and Saint-Saëns, making a remarkable success by her distinguished artistic personality.

The last two of the Saturday orchestral concerts—which are doing such a great work for music at Leeds, and have attracted audiences that have crowded every part of the Town Hall—have to be recorded. On February 28 Schubert's great Symphony in C—No. 9, according to the usual reckoning, No. 10 if the late Sir George Grove's surmise ever materialises—met with a revival that was timely, for it had not been heard at Leeds since the 1907 Festival. Mr. Hamilton Harty, under whom the efficiency of the Leeds Orchestra has advanced materially during the past season, gave a capital performance, full of the right rhythmical energy, and only wanting more string tone to be quite satisfactory. Miss Kathleen Moorhouse, a very artistic young violoncellist, played Tchaikovsky's 'Variations on a Rocooco Theme,' and Miss Elsie Suddaby was an equally artistic vocalist. On March 13, at the eighth and last concert, Miss Fanny Davies gave us a pure delight in Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in A (Köchel, No. 488), in which we have Mozart at his best, and in its highly sympathetic interpretation we had Miss Davies at her best. Another feature of the programme was to have been Mr. Hamilton Harty's Violin Concerto, but the parts were lost in transmission, and Miss Bessie Rawlins had to fall back on Tchaikovsky's Concerto, of which she gave a brilliant performance. The recitals which are so pleasant a feature of Leeds University life have been continued. On February 17 Miss Isobel Purdon and Miss Kathleen Frise Smith played violin sonatas by César Franck and John Ireland (the slow movement only from the work in A minor); on March 2 Miss May Summers introduced Schumann's 'Études Symphoniques'; but the most interesting event was the recital—or demonstration, as it might be called—given by Mr. Edward Mitchell on February 25 of Scriabin's music, when he played with rare insight a series of his pieces in chronological order, from the early Preludes in the manner of Chopin to the highly individualised 'Poème Nocturne' and the strongly contrasted 'Vers la Flamme.' Finally, on March 17, M. Vladimir Rosing gave one of his remarkably individual vocal recitals. On February 23 the Ghent Quartet gave a concert at which some unusual chamber music with flute was included, along with a Mozart String Quartet. On March 1 Miss Doris Grover gave a recital of songs at the pianoforte, with Mr. Alex. Cohen as violinist; and on March 6 a recital by Mr. H. P. Richardson, on the fine organ in St. Chad's Church, was given on behalf of the local 'Music in War-time' scheme, which up till now has provided over fourteen hundred concerts for soldiers in Yorkshire centres.

At Wakefield the Choral Society, on March 3, gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-Bon Suite,' pleasing if undistinguished music, which would have had more effect had it been interpreted in a rather more playful vein. Mr. Charles Knowles was the soloist, and Mr. H. H. Pickard conducted. On February 13 the last of the chamber concerts, the organization of which has been a labour of love for Miss Clarkson for over thirty years, took place, Miss Marjorie Sothan being the pianist and Miss Dorothy Silk the vocalist. The York Musical Society, under Dr. Bairstow, gave Elgar's 'King Olaf' on March 17.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT

The seventh Philharmonic Concert, on February 24, was conducted by Mr. Geoffrey Toye, whose programme opened with the 'Leonora' Overture No. 3, and closed with a well-tried popular favourite in Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance.' For Sibelius's 'En Saga' Mr. Toye secured without undue demonstration a highly effective performance of the complex score; not only did he realise the din and tumult of the battle-music, but sensed the ghostly atmosphere of the deserted hall. The work is a powerful example of programme-music, which stamps its composer as an original force whose 'Finlandia' at least is a national asset.

Miss Isolda Menges chose as her chief solo the Violin Concerto in D minor, No. 2, by Max Bruch, a work of which it may be said that it is orchestral music firstly and virtuosic music secondly. Its mood is ponderous, an impression of heaviness being given at the outset in the opening symphonic Adagio. In the Concerto there is far more of constructive skill and clever orchestration than inspiration, but at least the opportunity was given to Miss Menges for displaying her astonishing skill as an executant and deep feeling as an interpreter. Her Bach-playing in a familiar Prelude and Gavotte in E was less notable. We have heard lesser players come nearer to the Bach spirit. It was in the tender feeling of a MS. 'Samoan lullaby' that Miss Menges made the irresistible appeal of a great artist. In Ernest Bryson's impressive short choral work 'The Stranger' it proved singularly advantageous that the baritone solo was transferred to a contralto and sung by Miss Astra Desmond. This second performance of Mr. Bryson's highly imaginative work deepened favourable impressions already made of the music. The composer seems admirably to have caught the spirit of the poem in which Miss Baines has been inspired by Watts's picture 'Love and Death.' The choral part, in its modern elusive harmonies, is not easy to sing, but affords one or two forceful passages which came out well. Miss Desmond was recalled for her splendid singing, and was also heard in an attractive vocal 'Nocturne' by T. R. Heath, suggestively scored for flute, harp, horn, and strings.

The Philharmonic Society's choir and orchestra gave a striking performance of Dr. R. Vaughan Williams's great work, 'A Sea Symphony,' at the Society's eighth concert on March 2. For so much perfection the chief credit is due to Sir Henry Wood, whose interest in the production impelled him to make several special journeys to Liverpool to hold exacting rehearsals that were entered upon con amore by the choir, and resulted in one of the finest first performances of a big work in the organization's long record. From first to last the chorists sang extraordinarily well. It was a triumphant march over a pathway strewn with choral difficulties demanding of the voices that they comport themselves as orchestral instruments. The Philharmonic band played magnificently, and amply vindicated its reputation; but it is the choir's performance which compels chief and cordial recognition.

Dr. Vaughan Williams is evidently an admirer of Walt Whitman, who, however, as R. L. Stevenson said, was neither a Milton nor a Shakespeare. But what the rugged American poet had to say is another affair from how he said it, and considered not as verse or even prose, but as speech, a great deal of the text that Dr. Williams has chosen is full of strange and admirable merit. And it is the evident sincerity of the composer's appreciation of the fine thoughts—often uncouth and gaunt in expression—found in 'Sea Drift' and 'Passage to India,' that led him to base his tremendous musical edifice upon the subject of the Sea. In his sequence of four symphonic movements Dr. Williams shows extraordinary ability in finding musical expression for Whitman's oracular utterances. His music is ablaze with their spirit. He reproduces their 'fine processional movement' with vivid touch, and whether in depicting the sea itself, or the steamers coming and going, the sea-captains, the mates, and all intrepid sailors, or the beach alone at night, or the waves of the ocean as depicted in the Scherzo, or, in the Finale, the transcendent speculations of the soul bound for the unknown sea, the entire setting takes an unexampled place in modern English music. America has produced a Walt Whitman—she has yet to produce a Vaughan Williams. His music is quite remarkable in the sustained strength of its individual manner and strenuous, even overpowering realism. His climaxes are constructively great and imposing, so that the quieter passages come with all the more relief, as, for example the suggestion of stillness and immensity in the orchestral ending to the second movement, and the tranquil and almost sacred atmosphere of the closing pages. To melody in its ordinary acceptation the composer makes no obvious concessions, and yet there are some fine themes, noticeably that of the fugal episode, 'Token of all brave captains,' which is so masterly and outstanding in the series of choral declamations. The performance made a deep effect, especially on those who could recall first impressions at the Leeds Festival of 1910.

Fully adequate vocal principals were found in Miss Carrie Tubb and Mr. Herbert Heyner. The remainder of the programme was devoted to Wagner in 'Wotan's Farewell' and 'Fire Spell' (solo, Mr. Horace Stevens), Kundry's Aria, 'Heart-Sorrow' (Miss Carrie Tubb), and 'O Star of Eve' (Mr. Herbert Heyner).

Sir Henry Wood received a greeting of especially hearty significance, for it was remembered that his fiftieth birthday fell on March 3, the day following the concert. At no other place are our redoubtable English musicians and great conductors more welcome than at Liverpool.

Miss Vivien Hughes gave a violin recital in Crane Hall on February 21, which revealed her as a player of considerable executive ability and taste. In her performance of Grieg's C minor Sonata and Mozart's Concerto in D major (with its three cadenzas), she was perhaps chiefly concerned with technical difficulties that she cleverly surmounted, but without displaying especial impulses of tenderness or passion. Her intonation is generally extremely accurate; there were few deviations, and when she adds a singing quality to her resolute tone she will further improve her present position as a player of high attainments and promise, who does credit to her training as a pupil of Auer. Miss Hughes had the advantage of sympathetic pianoforte accompaniments played by Mr. Walter Bridson.

The performance given by the British Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Raymond Rôze at the Philharmonic Hall on February 21, afforded quite sufficient testimony, if such were needed, to the unsurpassable quality of our native orchestral players. In this particular instance the combination led by Mr. Barry Squire is a very fine one, comprising powerful strings, smooth and liquid wood-wind, rich and sonorous brass, with resounding drums. But it is possible to take serious exception to the programme. Glinka, Wagner, Tchaikovsky ('Romeo and Juliet'), and Borodin ('Prince Igor' dances), were all represented, but not one British composer was played. Elgar's Overture, 'Cockaigne,' had been announced, but unfortunately the band parts had miscarried. And it made one regret that such a commanding artist as Miss Dora Gibson should have confined her attention to vocal items by Verdi and Puccini —which, be it said, she sang splendidly. Mr. Raymond Rôze made a favourable impression as a conductor au courant with the music, and well in touch with its performers.

Elgar's 'King Olaf' was a rather ambitious choice for the Post Office Choral Society to sing on March 10, conducted by Mr. Arthur Davies. The performance, however, reflected credit on the choral material, and on the Service from which it is drawn. The vocal soloists were Miss Mabel James, who made a favourable impression, Mr. Barrington Hooper, and Mr. Edward Dykes. The orchestra was led by Mr. Alfred Ross.

Concerts at Rushworth Hall have included a pianoforte recital on February 26 by Mr. Frank Merrick, an admirable player, especially well heard in Chopin's B minor Sonata, and in his own paraphrase on a Somersetshire folk-song, 'Hares on the Mountains'; also the trio recital on February 28, given by Miss Emily Giles (pianoforte), Mr. G. V. Roche (violin), and Mr. E. A. Wright (cello). The programme included an interesting performance of Elgar's Violin Sonata, Op. 82.

Mr. Frederick Dawson, at his recital at St. George's Hall on March 13, again displayed his masterly technique and mental illumination in a long programme which included the 'Waldstein' Sonata, Ireland's 'Island Spell,' Bridge's 'Fireflies,' Scott's 'Paradise Birds,' and examples of Debussy and Ravel, the latter represented by 'Ondine,' 'Jeux d'Eau,' and a paraphrase of the 'Pavane pour une Infante défunte.' Fourteen composers were included in a scheme carried through with abounding skill and vitality.

Interest in the musical Wednesday afternoons at Crane Hall has been well sustained, and among the soloists that brilliant pianist Miss Una Truman played one of Dr. James Lyon's new Album pieces, 'Across the Moors.' Her sister, Miss Irene Brooke (formerly Truman), also played on March 3, and under her new name bids fair to increase the interest of her interpretations by reason of the sense of maturity added to her equipment. This was shown in some cleverly played items by Debussy, Rebikov, and Cyril Scott.

Mr. Gordon Stutely, well-known as Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper's concert-agent, has been appointed conductor of the Southport Corporation Military Band at a salary of £200 for the season of nineteen or twenty weeks commencing in May. In Mr. Stutely the committee has made an excellent choice.

A huge audience attended the Welsh Choral Union's 'Elijah' on March 13, and was not disappointed—although, fine as was the singing and splendid in places, taken all round the performance was not surpassingly outstanding. The chain of essay and achievement was occasionally broken; it certainly was by the poor singing of the semi-chorus, but in the big choruses the torrent of vocal tone and responsive intelligence of the singers preserved the beauty and undimmed freshness of the glorious music. Mr. Lewys James's assumption of the Prophet's rôle was marked by strong personality, although departing from the conventional idea that the part, at any rate on the concert-platform, gives opportunity for dignity of style and vocal beauty of tone as well as vehemence. Greater restraint would have been acceptable in a reading at least remarkable for its unflagging spirit and vigour. Excellent principals were also found in Miss Eva Rich, Miss Astra Desmond, Miss Lilian Read, and Mr. Sidney Coltham. The orchestra was commensurate, but did not shine in a hurried performance of the overture. A line is due to the steady singing of the imported London boy, Leslie Sorensen, and nothing but high appreciation can be expressed of the admirable powers of suggestion and command which Mr. Hopkin Evans displayed as conductor.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT

Memories of the Beecham season which closed on February 26, the most successful ever given at Manchester, are tinged with regret that Lancashire will have no further opportunities for hearing this Company for another twelve months, the reason being that the Manchester Spring season and the Blackpool Summer visit have both been abandoned for this year. The genuine greatness of this season is more clearly discerned in retrospect. The years which brought to us 'Othello,' 'Boris,' or 'Ivan the Terrible' merited that description, but were not comparable with the grandeur attained by the recent numerous and adequate productions of 'The Mastersingers' and 'Parsifal.'

Hearing 'Parsifal' for the third time during the final week only intensified views already expressed here. One marvels increasingly at Miss Ancrum's Kundry—how dramatically uncouth and sullen, almost demoniacal, in Act I; then her frantic defiance of Klingsor, and the subtlety of the temptation scene with Parsifal. And perhaps most wonderful of all, the pathos of the final Act, neither sung nor spoken—just eloquent gesture and facial expression. To find these four-fold qualities in an actress would be sufficiently great, but to find them uniquely developed in association with such exceptional lyrical gifts is one of those miracles that happen perhaps once every few generations. This performance showed how much an adequate presentation of the sacred drama is linked up with a Klingsor whose art is sufficiently drastic in its graphic force. If a satisfactory proof of this character is to be pulled, the etching-needle and acid of the actor's imagination must have bitten deep into the plate. Herbert Langley has this mordant quality. Another member of the Company who plays this rôle might almost be likened to a soft, mellow, mezzotint translation of the character, and then Kundry's tremendous defiance of Klingsor lost much of its power. Those dungeon shrieks, so perfect in their purely musical aspect, make one's blood run cold when Klingsor has strung up her mind to such an intolerable pitch of intensity that her entire being revolts in that shattering climax.

As an all-round conception of the part, I should prefer Walter Hyde's Parsifal to that of Mullings, although the latter's intellectuality would not be denied in the Kundry colloquy in the second Act and onwards to the end. If 'Parsifal' is again included next winter, I hope Manchester may have the privilege and responsibility of providing the chorus of Grail Knights; and if, further, we could command an orchestra of, say, a hundred players, the two defects of the production will have been cured. 'Parsifal' had a dozen performances, and naturally matured more rapidly than 'Mastersingers,' which was played only three or four times. The genius of this is not alien to British interpretation, but many things point to the ripening process being a slower one than in the case of 'Parsifal.' Despite our stage limitations, Manchester may now reasonably hope soon to enjoy Wagner festivals in all essentials as great as Bayreuth.

Last month I foreshadowed the return next season to an approach to pre-war strength in the Hallé Orchestra. Mr. Brand Lane engages the band, and, ever a believer in getting his blow in first, he characteristically announces a force of a hundred for his two March Saturday concerts, although the mid-March programme scarcely calls for the greater numbers so much as did a Handel-Beethoven-Wagner programme on February 28. I think I am correct in stating that apart from 'Elijah' (at these concerts also) the Handel 'Zadok the Priest' coronation anthem on February 28 was the only choral item of any consequence heard so far this year in Central Manchester.

The conspicuous defect of this winter's musical schemes at Manchester has been the comparative dearth of good big-scale choral work (although Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Hamilton Harty's 'Mystic Trumpeter' are yet to be heard). In the smaller forms of choral art the Co-operative Wholesale Society's male choir, the Sale and District Mixed-Voice Choir (both conducted by Mr. Alfred Higson), and the Manchester and Stockport Vocal Societies (both conducted by Dr. T. Keighley), have all maintained their standard of comparative excellence if not of absolute perfection, in frequent performances during the winter.

The musical policy of the Co-operative Wholesale Society throughout South Lancashire appears to be of a definitely propagandist character. A packed Free Trade Hall, at their prices, cannot possibly meet much less exceed expenses. The Society's educational aims take precedence of commercial ones in the matter of high-class lectures and music. Its audiences too, are of quite a distinct type, and if only their guidance is controlled in a sane and enlightened manner this public—like the old Harrison and other promoters' ballad public of former days—should proceed naturally from such musical fare as is to-day provided (good of its sort) to an appreciation of orchestral work in its simpler and later in its more complex forms. As an aid to such an end its educational committee might do much worse than institute in numerous areas series of lectures on composers, instruments, how to listen, and other similar points in intelligent appreciation.

The Parks Committee of the City Council, through its chairman, Mr. William Melland, adopts the following features in its Summer scheme: Band performances—Choral concerts—Music for children's dancing—Folk-dancing—Punch and Judy shows for the tiny tots. On account of expense noted military bands will not be engaged this year. £200 will be devoted to the choral concerts, and massed choirs will sing on four different occasions in the largest parks. We have at Manchester numerous rather dreary wastes, often railed round and known as 'open spaces': in the centre a low wooden platform. Last summer somebody conceived the idea of using a street piano-organ as an accompaniment to children's dancing (on hard earth, mind you). Twenty trials were made, the cost being £14. So satisfactorily was the experiment received that this year the Parks Committee shoulders the burden. May one suggest that for the hurdy-gurdy there be substituted a stentorian gramophone playing records of dance music by an orchestra or reed and wind band?

Mr. Landon Ronald, on March 11, brought us back to a solid programme of the Richter régime. Mr. Arthur Catterall in the Brahms Violin Concerto and in Novacek's 'Perpetuum Mobile' played with brilliance, virility, and great emotional power.

The Gentlemen's Concerts have provided chamber music or recitals throughout the season, and have lost £200 in the process. What would have happened had orchestral work been given may be imagined. Unless public support alters, this, our oldest musical Society, cannot continue. Owing to investment depreciation the funds now available are almost negligible; the old basis of a social musical function is no longer possible.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT

The outstanding event of February was the impressive performance of Byrd's Mass for four voices, given in the Cathedral by the Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union on February 11. The work was sung in the Lady Chapel behind the high altar, by which an ethereal effect was created that considerably heightened the intense devotional atmosphere of this sublime masterpiece. The fact that such a work had been written by an English composer must have opened the eyes of many who had hitherto been ignorant of the greatness of our 16th century Church music. The choir also gave a fine interpretation of Frank Bridge's 'Prayer,' with Mr. William Ellis at the organ, who, by his skilful suggestion of the salient features of the score, made up for the lack of orchestral accompaniment. The violoncello solos of Mr. Carl Fuchs, with organ accompaniment, were beautiful features in the programme, and comprised movements from Bach, Stradella, Schubert, Durante, and Elgar.

On February 14 the Beecham Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Albert Coates, gave a welcome performance of Beethoven's seventh Symphony, which had not been heard here for many years. Other items were the Good Friday music from 'Parsifal,' Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings, and the last movement of Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Scheherazade.' Miss Edna Thornton and Mr. Peter Dawson were the vocalists.

The Newcastle and District Church Musicians' Union, a new Society resulting from the amalgamation of the local centres of the Free Church Musicians' Union and the Organists' Association, held its first meeting on February 21, when Mr. George Dodds gave an interesting lecture on 'Modern British Songs.' There was a full and varied programme of illustrations, including examples from Granville Bantock, Frank Bridge, Gardiner, Farrar, Warlock, Scott, Whittaker, Vaughan Williams, Dale, Clulow, Ireland, and Weston-Nicholl, which were sung with much taste by the lecturer and Mrs. Dodds, with Mr. H. Y. Dodds as accompanist.

On Sunday, February 29, the Newcastle Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. E. L. Bainton, gave a well-balanced performance of Glazounov's sixth Symphony. The remainder of the programme consisted of Balfour Gardiner's 'Overture to a Comedy' (first performance at Newcastle), the 'Peer Gynt' Suite (No. 1), the Hungarian March from Berlioz's 'Faust,' the Scherzo from 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' and the Gavotte from Mozart's 'Idomeneo.' Miss Edith Scorer sang Elgar's 'Sea Pictures.'

On March 3 Messrs. Alex. Cohen and F. Anderson-Tyrer gave a violin and pianoforte recital, at which the novelty was Catoire's second Sonata (Op. 20). The programme was completed by the new Elgar Sonata, and that in A major of César Franck. All three works were well interpreted, though perhaps the violin was a little too insistent, and inclined to treat the pianoforte as a mere background.

Mr. Mark Hambourg visited the town on March 9, and gave a programme ranging from Bull to Malipiero. The outstanding features of the performance were the rollicking English humour which came out very strongly in the selections from Bull, Blow, Arne, and Grainger; and the wonderful verve in the player's interpretation of the 'Variations on a theme by Paganini' of Brahms. After all, Malipiero is no worse than Schönberg, and betrays the influence of the latter very markedly in places.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT

The Sacred Harmonic Society gave a concert-recital of Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah' on February 19. Local concert-goers were greatly pleased by Madame Kirkby-Lunn's reappearance at Nottingham after a too-long interval, and her interpretation of the part of Delilah was instinct with all the warmth and subtlety it demands. Mr. Maurice D'Oisly was an effective Samson, Mr. Steward Gardner's baritone was admirably displayed in the part of the High Priest, and Mr. Harold Beresford sang well as Abimelech. Local talent was represented by Mr. W. Downing, in solo and concerted work, and minor parts were filled by Mr. G. A. Allen and Mr. P. W. Pendleton. Under Mr. Allen Gill the choral numbers were finely given, exhibiting admirable balance, spirit, and precision.

The final International Celebrity Subscription Concert was held on February 23, when Madame Clara Butt, Miss Rosina Buckman, Miss Adela Verne, and M. Melsa attracted a crowded audience. These concerts have proved a great success, and we understand that arrangements are being made for their continuance next season.

Mr. William Turner's celebrated Girls' Prize Choir was as delightful as ever on February 29, when the invariably pure tone of the singers was heard to admirable advantage in all the numbers presented. The soloists included Miss Mabel Linwood, the Misses Grace and Miriam Allington, May Ward, Flora Webb, and Ida Woolley. The last of this season's Wilson Peck Subscription Concerts drew a very full house on March 3, when four Beecham Opera singers filled a delightful programme, Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Frank Mullings, Mr. William Michael, and Mr. Norman Allin being responsible for the vocal items, and Mr. Jacques Van Lier contributing violoncello solos.

The Philharmonic Society concert on March 6 for the first time supplemented the choir by an orchestra of a hundred and twenty. Under Mr. William Turner's direction the choir sang with fine incisiveness in Stanford's 'The Revenge,' a choral fantasia on the 'Bohemian Girl,' 'Hail, bright abode' ('Tannhäuser'), and Granville Bantock's 'Emer's lament for Cuchulain.' The principals were Miss Florence Mellors, Miss Lucy Jones, the Misses G. and M. Allington, and Mr. G. A. Quinton.

As already indicated, the Hallé Orchestra under Sir Henry Wood, on March 10, presented Beethoven's second Symphony, and as was to be expected gave a fine interpretation of the work. Other items were Weber's Overture to 'Der Freischütz,' the Prelude to Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman,' and some attractive modern works. These comprised 'A Shropshire Lad,' by the late Lieut. George Butterworth, Ravel's 'Pavane pour une Infante Défunte,' and Arensky's Variations on a Tchaikovsky theme. The band, together with Sir Henry Wood, were most enthusiastically received, and the concert brought the series to a triumphant conclusion for the present season.

The William Woolley Choral Society once more vindicated its high reputation when on March 11 this choir gave fine examples of unaccompanied part-singing in a setting of 'Mary Morrison,' by G. J. Bennett, Granville Bantock's 'They that go down to the sea in ships,' and Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to Music.' Solos were sung by Misses L. Sheraton and Ada Watson, and Messrs. E. Carnall and B. E. Aske.

Mr. Llewelyn Bevan secured a triumph in his pianoforte-recital at Loughborough on March 4. For an hour and a half he delighted a large audience by talk, play, and song, all concerned with Coleridge-Taylor's compositions. Mr. Bevan's illustrations included excerpts from the 'Petit Suite de Concert,' 'Forest Scenes,' 'African Suite,' and 'Valse Suite,' and as vocal examples 'Eleanore' and selections from 'Hiawatha.'

The Midland Federation of Competitive Choirs gave a performance at Ilkeston on March 6. The choir assembled comprised Mansfield, Ilkeston, Kirkby, Sutton, and Annesley, the vocal principals being Miss Pansy Moore and Mr. J. H. Markham. Mr. J. Hancock presided at the organ.

The Derby Railway Servants' Orphanage forty-first annual concert was held on February 14. Mr. Norman Allin, who had been announced, was unable to appear, his place being taken by Mr. William Michael, and other contributors to a pleasing programme were Miss Hilda Dederich, a clever young pianist, Mr. Albert Sammons, Miss Flora Woodman, Miss Carmen Hill, and Mr. Hubert Eisdell. The children of the Orphanage sang two part-songs very charmingly under M. A. W. Wilford's direction.

The staff and students of Belmont School of Music and members of All Saints' Choir (Derby) gave an excellent concert on February 17 in the Temperance Hall, for the benefit of All Saints' Church funds. The British Symphony Orchestra visited Derby on February 18, and under Mr. Raymond Rôze gave an interesting and varied selection of work. Miss Dora Gibson's vocal numbers were appreciated. On March 5 the Derby Orchestral Society revived its suspended activities. Mr. F. Stanton's conductorship produced excellent results, and his handling of the band was excellent. Unfortunately Mr. Tom Burke was unable to fulfil his engagement, but the committee was fortunate in securing Miss Rosina Buckman and Mr. Maurice D'Oisly in his stead. Miss Adela Verne and M. Melsa completed a quartet of artists who could not fail to satisfy even the most critical audience. The Derby Orpheus Society's concert on March 10 taxed the capacities of the Temperance Hall to their limits. Under Dr. A. G. Claypole's clever management the unaccompanied choir of male voices gave a fine reading of 'Music all Powerful' (Walmisley), 'Must I then part' (F. Otto), 'How dear to me' (Pinsuti), 'Bold Turpin' (F. Bridge), and other items. Mr. Paul Beard contributed violin solos, and Miss Marjorie Claridge's singing evoked hearty applause.

We are requested to draw attention to the fact that the Leicester Chamber Concert Society has given a series of highly successful concerts during its season 1919-20, the dates being October 21, December 19, and February 17. Miss Grace Burrows, Mr. Frank Dyson, and Mr. Percy Jones were responsible for the programme on the last-named date, with Miss Constance Hardcastle as vocalist. Old English work was admirably presented in Purcell's 'Golden Sonata,' and Boyce's Sonata in A major. Miss Hardcastle's examples were drawn from both old and modern works, and added charm to an artistically satisfying evening.

The chief feature of Mr. Bernard Johnson's programme on March 7 was Beethoven's Symphony in D, given in a transcription for pianoforte duet and organ.

OXFORD

On Sunday, February 28, Brahms's 'Requiem' was given in the Sheldonian by the Bach Choir and Choral Society, under the able direction of the Professor of Music, Dr. Allen. The audience was very full and attentive to the music throughout. The choir is now a large one, and the infusion of the young fresh voices of the undergraduates has vastly improved its tone—indeed the keenness of the singers may be gauged when it is stated that the 'Requiem' was prepared by Dr. Allen for performance in, roughly speaking, one term. Where the whole was excellent it seems invidious to mention any particular items, but we should be inclined to give the palm to the interpretation of the first chorus, and 'Behold all flesh is as the grass.' The soloists were Miss Ethel McLelland and Mr. John Huntingdon. Miss McLelland's artistic singing of 'Ye now are sorrowful' was indeed beautiful to listen to, while Mr. Huntingdon sang with the greatest care, and with excellent insight of the composer's demands. Miss Venables led the band with her customary distinction, and the Professor is to be heartily congratulated on the excellent performance.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT

The last of the season's orchestral Promenade Concerts attracted a full audience, from which may be adduced a growing regard for orchestral music of good type. The resumption of these important concerts—interrupted by the war—is due to the initiative of a small committee whose faith in the musical judgment of the Sheffield public is at last being justified. In place of the usual symphony a group of selections from Wagner's works took pride of place in the programme. All were played with regard for the traditions of this fine Sheffield band, but especial brilliance and authority were revealed in the Prelude and Love-Death from 'Tristan and Isolde,' the Overture to 'The Mastersingers' and the 'Entrance of the Gods' (closing scene, 'The Rheingold'). Mr. J. A. Rodgers, who conducted, wrought some effective climaxes, while his instrumentalists were sympathetically responsive to his feeling for nuance in the more emotional passages, especially in the selection from 'Tristan.' The programme also included the 'Casse Noisette' Suite, 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance,' and Moszkowski's rarely-heard Pianoforte Concerto. In the last-named Miss Helen Guest played the solo with technical certitude, and in the changing moods demanded by Moszkowski's exuberant fancy. The Eva Rich Ladies' Choir sang with orchestra in works by Rimsky-Korsakov, Gustav Holst ('To Agni,' from the Rig-Veda), and Wagner, in which the singers added to their already favourable local reputation.

The Victoria Hall Choral Society performed Elgar's 'King Olaf' under its new conductor, Mr. A. S. Burrows, at one of the Victoria Hall Saturday popular concerts. Thoroughly reorganized, the choir now reveals a fair balance of parts, and a general bracing-up of technical and interpretative details. The choralists sang in spirited style, being seconded by a competent little orchestra and a satisfactory trio of soloists—Miss Sarah Crook, Mr. William Burrows, and Mr. Stanley Beckett.

The Barnsley St. Cecilia Choral Society is also experiencing the stimulating influence of a new conductor. Mr. J. F. Staton secured some striking choral results in Coleridge-Taylor's 'A Tale of Old Japan,' and there is promise that this old-established Yorkshire choir will resume its former high place. The soloists were Miss Lilian Dillingham, Miss Hilda Cragg-Jones, Mr. A. M. Giddins, and Mr. James Mason.

At the Foxon Five o'Clock Concerts a couple of gifted young musicians, Mr. John E. Bingham (violin) and Mr. Stanley Kaye (pianoforte), collaborated in a nicely poised performance of César Franck's duet Sonata, and Miss Etty Ferguson sang some songs with great beauty of tone and warmth of temperament.

Among other interesting events of the month have been a pleasantly varied music-making by the Eva Rich Ladies' Choir and Orchestra, a performance of 'Elijah' by the Victoria Hall Choral Society, and of 'Hero and Leander' by the Anston Musical Society; also the last Wilson Peck Subscription Concert (Miss Olga Haley, Miss Lilia Kanevskaya, Mr. Herbert Heyner, and Mr. Albert Sammons).

SOUTH WALES

At Cory Hall, Cardiff, on February 18, Mr. Arthur Hirst gave an instructive pianoforte lecture-recital on 'The average man's attitude towards music.' He treated his subject broadly, and in tracing the development of music as an art to interpret the human emotions, he succeeded in interesting a keenly-appreciative audience.

On March 4, at the same hall, M. Jaques-Dalcroze gave an educative lecture-demonstration of his method of eurhythmics. He was assisted by four lady students from his Institute at Geneva.

On Thursday, February 26, the Cardiff Musical Society gave its second concert of the season under the conductorship of the veteran Mr. T. E. Aylward. The programme consisted of unaccompanied part-songs by the choir, which numbered some two hundred and sixty voices, and also of solos by Miss Marjorie Perkins, Mr. John Coates, and Miss Nannette Evans (violin). The programme included Parry's 'Music, when soft voices die,' Oliver King's 'Echo song,' and Reginald Somerville's 'Who rides for the King.' The gem of the evening was Gibbons's 'Hosanna to the Son of David.'

The Empire, Cardiff, was packed to the doors on February 28, the occasion being the matinée of the International Celebrity Concerts. The artists were Madame Clara Butt, Miss Rosina Buckman, Miss Adela Verne, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, and M. Melsa, with Miss Grace Torrens at the pianoforte.

The Cardiff Blue Ribbon Choir, under the baton of Mr. Jenkyn Morris, gave its thirty-ninth annual concert at Cory Hall on March 6 to a crowded audience. The items performed were Stanford's 'The Revenge,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' and a composition by the conductor entitled 'Sandalphon.'

The sixteenth annual concert of the Choral Society of University College, Cardiff, was held on March 11. These concerts, always choice and elevating, are looked forward to, and this one was no exception. The evening was devoted to Bach, the conductor, Prof. David Evans, wielding the baton worthily. His conception was idealistic, and the choir excelled itself in 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure' and 'God's time is the best.'

The Welsh National Orchestra is at last no longer in a nebulous state. Primarily formed to accompany the choirs in the Welsh National Festivals to be held at Neath, Barry, Swansea, and Newport, in the third week of April, the promoters, with Lord Howard de Walden as chairman, intend it as a forerunner of the Welsh National Orchestra. Already forty-five instrumentalists from South Wales have been selected, and a group of performers from London have been engaged to stiffen them. Mr. Phil. Lewis, of the London Symphony Orchestra, is the leader, and rehearsals have begun. It is hoped that as time goes on the Principality will be able to supply all the members of the Orchestra. Cardiff appears to have held itself aloof from this movement. However, the Lord Mayor of Cardiff is reported to have promised to call a meeting of Cardiff musicians to discuss the question.

Guarantees for support of the Orchestra are being given by each of the towns where the Festivals are to be held, but the question of its permanent support has already been mooted, and the idea of a special grant looms large in the public mind. The promoters have high ideals, but it is patent that it will take some time to effect a degree of proficiency that will place the Welsh National Orchestra alongside the great orchestras 'across the border.'

In the matter of small orchestras Cardiff is rather well served. The Arthur Angle and the Cardiff Symphony Orchestral Concerts are held every Sunday evening, the former at Park Hall and the latter at Olympia, and generally a special vocalist is engaged as well. On February 29 the celebrated Aberdare Male Party took part in Mr. Angle's concert, and the Cardiff Symphony company secured the aid of the Treorchy Royal Male-Voice Party on March 14. Both of these organizations gave an excellent account of themselves.

We understand that a third orchestral concert will be held at the Gaiety in the Roath suburb of Cardiff every Sunday.

On February 13, at Pontardawe, in the Swansea Valley, the Pant-Teg Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. George Evans, and assisted by a full orchestra under the leadership of Mr. C. H. Morgan, gave a successful performance of Beethoven's 'Mount of Olives' and Stanford's 'The Revenge.' The supporting artists were Miss Ethel Bilsland, and Messrs. Tudor Davies, Richard Daniels (vocalists), and Mr. H. Rees (violin).

'Messiah' was performed on February 26 at the Public Hall, Pontardawe, by the choir of Soar Chapel. The conductor was Mr. J. T. Jones, and the soloists were Miss Mills - Reynolds (Pontypridd), Miss Jones - Davies (Glanaman), Mr. Dan Jones (London), and Mr. W. W. Davies (Alltwen).

The Swansea St. David's Day Festival was held at Albert Hall on the evening of March 1, when the accommodation was sorely taxed, every available space being occupied long before the concert commenced. The choir consisted of four hundred voices, and the programme comprised Welsh airs, glees, and native part-songs, with selections on the harp and an organ solo.

The Swansea Valley Musical Festival was held on March 4. The Pontardawe Male-Voice Party, conducted by Mr. David Daniel, took part, supported by the following artists: Miss Rosina Buckman, Mr. Frank Mullings, Mr. Norman Allin, and Melsa, the famous violinist.

A concert of English music was given at the Colonial Hall before a crowded audience on January 30, when an excellent programme representing the old as well as the new school was presented. Goossens's Violin Sonata was played by M. Mangeot and the composer. Another hearing might permit us to form some definite views about it, but a first impression is that the work has no real message and is nothing more than a clever and lengthy study in modern harmony. Quite the contrary must be said of Frank Bridge's Violoncello Sonata. Here is a work of much loveliness, with really beautiful phrases. Altogether it seems, however, beyond the capabilities of the average violoncellist. The 'Five Impressions of a Holiday,' played by the composer (Mr. Goossens), M. Mangeot (violin), and M. Pitsch (violoncello), are delightful little tone-pictures, and were played most daintily. The audience was charmed with them. Miss Henschel was very successful in her singing of a batch of modern songs by English composers, but infinitely more so in her rendering of several old folk-songs, particularly 'Oh no, John.'

On the occasion of the centenary of the birth of Lekeu (1870-94), the young Belgian musician who died at the age of twenty-four), several concerts of his works were given. His Violin Sonata is, perhaps, the best known of his compositions.

We have had two concerts from the Ukrainian Choir—the second 'by request,' as the first was such a triumph. The impression created certainly is that nothing so beautiful in the way of choral singing has been heard of late years at Brussels. Although in the March number of the Musical Times a good deal was written about this Choir's performances, little reference was made to their wonderful basses—surely the outstanding feature of the ensemble. It is very much to be doubted if England could produce a dozen better, from the point of view of foundation tone. Moreover we were treated to a good variety of styles.

An interesting concert of music for two pianofortes was given on March 13 by MM. Clutyens and Scharès. The programme was varied, and included a first performance in Belgium of Debussy's 'En blanc et noir.' On March 14 M. Swolfs gave a vocal recital of modern Belgian songs, amongst the most interesting being a group by Vreuls and another by Jongen. Victor Benham's recital on March 15 was very successful.

ROME

On the evening of Candlemas, the first of the seven promised novelties was given at the Costanzi Theatre, when Ricardo Zandonai's 'Via della Finestra' ('By Way of the Window') was presented to the Roman public, and very favourably received. This work, first produced a few months ago at Pesaro, is of the opera-buffa type, and has as its inspiring motive the eternal theme of the mother-in-law. Zandonai has scored a good success with this new opera, and added to his reputation, which is fast becoming assured in Italy. It may be of interest to record that he is a native of Sacco, in the Trentino, where he was born in 1883. He studied at Pesaro under Mascagni, and his best-known work hitherto is his 'Francesca da Rimini.'

The operatic season at the Costanzi was inaugurated with Mascagni's 'Iris.' Wagner's 'Die Walküre' immediately followed, its production being acclaimed as an event of real importance in the artistic world of Rome, where for four years everything German had been rigorously banned. A crowded public thronged the Costanzi at every representation, and although something to be desired was lacking in the singing, the presentation of the work has been eminently successful. The critic of the Messaggero, in a careful analysis of the psychological preparation necessary for a just appreciation of Wagner's music, makes an acute observation when he writes: 'An initiation, especially to the "Nibelung Ring," is particularly difficult for the Italian public owing to the dearth of Wagner literature in Italy, whilst such literature elsewhere—in France, for example—is both abundant and important.' This is a question to which the present writer has devoted some attention, and believes he is right in adding that not only does the poverty of real Wagnerian literature militate against a just appreciation of Wagner's music in Italy, but also that what there is is almost useless. The translations of Wagner's literary works, for example, are very unsatisfactory, and in no way reproduce in Italian the real spirit of the writer, but are mere heavy, ponderous German concepts clothed in Italian language, without any spiritual transmutation. The result is that the Italian reader remains always oppressed by a literary form from which it is impossible to extract the real sentiment.

Verdi's 'Forza del Destino' followed Wagner, and a splendid representation was assured by the presence of Signor Mattia Battistini, who for some years has sung at the Paris Opéra, and is an authentic representative of the classic school of the bel canto. The choice of this opera gave rise to some unfavourable criticism, and certainly it was not the happiest selection, not only on account of the banal character of much of the music, but for the too rapid transition from a work of the nature of 'Die Walküre.'

Miscellaneous

WOKING.—London musicians were again drawn to Woking on March 20, when the Musical Society continued its Festival of British Composers and Sir Edward Elgar conducted a concert of his own works. The Society possesses a capable orchestra and a capable choir, but it was the former that played the chief part in this concert. The hall of the County Secondary School—the best that Woking can provide—was unduly flattering to orchestral sound and gave little help to choral voices, especially with the singers packed away in the gallery. The consequence was that parts of 'King Olaf' became music for brass instruments, with orchestral help and choral accompaniment. As soloists Mr. Matthew Newton and Mr. Joseph Farrington were better placed for effect. The choir made better showing in the part-songs 'As torrents in summer' and 'It's oh, to be a wild wind,' which were conducted by Mr. H. Scott-Baker. The orchestra had its own way in the 'Cockaigne' Overture, the 'Enigma' Variations, and the 'Pomp and Circumstance' March in D.

The Great Eastern Railway Musical Society gave a concert at Cambridge on February 28 with a choir of two hundred and thirty voices drawn from London, Cambridge, Ipswich, and Norwich, assisted by the orchestra of the Society. Colonel Galloway conducted. A similar concert was given at Ipswich on March 6.

A concert of Purcell's music was given at the Glastonbury Festival School on March 7. The instrumental works in the programme were the Trio-Sonatas in C and B minor for two violins and violoncello, Pianoforte Suite in C major, and the 'Golden Sonata.'

The Lyceum Ladies' Amateur Orchestra has just been formed by members of the Lyceum Club, Miss Muriel Rynd-Jack being appointed conductor. It is intended to give one big concert and various small ones yearly.

Miss Katherine Eggar has been elected a vice-president of the Efficiency Club for Business and Professional Women.

A WESTMINSTER PILGRIM BY SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE.

Three-hundred-and-sixty pages, Large Demy 8vo, with a Frontispiece in Colour by Sir LESLIE WARD, numerous Illustrations, and a special Portrait of the Author by Sir WILLIAM RICHMOND, K.C.B., R.A.

CLOTH, GILT, SIXTEEN SHILLINGS NET.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

Under the happy title of "A Westminster Pilgrim" Sir Frederick Bridge has narrated in a vivacious manner many of the most outstanding events of his distinguished career. The volume has qualities which make it an important contribution to the history of music in England.

EVENING STANDARD.

The book must be read to be appreciated. Stories wrenched from their context do less than justice to the personality which pervades the volume

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Sir Frederick Bridge's retirement from the organ-loft at Westminster Abbey has enabled him to complete a delightful volume of reminiscences. Is a most readable book—a big one, too. Every page bristles with good things, and it would take much space to do justice to them even in a general survey.

EVENING NEWS.

Sir Frederick Bridge's own story of his long life in the service of the Church and its music is told at length; and a very beautiful spirit of devotion to his life's task runs through the pages.

ORGANIST AND CHOIRMASTER.

This is indeed a notable book, and one which stands—and probably will stand—somewhat by itself in the whole range of English autobiographical literature; . . . it is full of humour from cover to cover.

MUSICAL STANDARD.

Concerning the book itself, it ought in justice to be added that it is a very full record of an active musical life. It is admirably arranged, excellently printed, and copiously illustrated. The "get-up" generally is all that could be desired, and one handles it with infinite pleasure.

MUSIC TRADES REVIEW.

From first to last the book is of intense interest. It is of great historical value . . . and makes exceedingly pleasant reading . . . Music-lovers must not consider their libraries complete until this new volume has been added.

"A brilliant and genial new work—always very melodious, richly scored, and invariably distinguished by an atmosphere of romantic charm."—Daily Chronicle.

"The Divisions increase in interest. The Fourth and Sixth may be specially mentioned as being the perfection of musical light music."—Morning Post.

"Contrast is one of the leading features of the work, specially marked in the Third Division, which might illustrate a rural fête of bucolic frolic."—Referee.

"The delicate Second Division is a gem of joyous animation."—Globe.

"It is brilliant and cheerful, extremely clever, and has the spontaneity which can only be achieved by complete mastery of resource."—Star.

"It was full of grace, melodious, and, above all, lucidly expressed. The Fifth Division is a fine exposition of a valse theme."—Weekly Dispatch.

"The composer has lost none of his virility and joyousness—it is fresh open-air music."—Observer.

"Edward German's Theme and Six Divisions provide us with a whiff of sweet English briar-rose—very refreshing."—World.

Says one of our Craftsmen :

“WHAT! ANOTHER TESTIMONIAL? IT'S FINE TO FIND OUR STRINGS SO MUCH APPRECIATED.”

“Just listen to this letter—‘I find all the D Strings most satisfactory.

‘The tone is pure, and responds sympathetically. All the C Strings are good, but the medium Sterling Silver Burnished suits my instrument best.

‘I may say that I have never had a String that gives me so much pleasure to play upon.

‘Schumann’s D minor Sonata taxes the strings to their utmost, and I find this answers in every way.

“K. R. CULLINGFORD.”

“Fine letter, isn’t it? I’m going to quote from others later on. We get many such—all telling us what I am telling you—that ‘Cathedral’ and ‘Summit’ Strings are easily the finest on the market. Cheaper and far better than the foreign brands.”

“Please do not forget that we make good our claims by sending a free ‘Cathedral’ or ‘Summit’ String to any one who cares to write us. Have we had your application? Why not write now?”

The Daily Telegraph says:

“... What Sir Frederick Bridge doesn’t know about the great madrigal period in English music is surely not worth knowing. . . . Once more he puts us all in his debt by the publication of ‘The Cryes of London.’ . . . Perhaps the most attractive of the three is Richard Deering’s: ‘Have ye any wood to cleave?’ Sung by a bass voice to a beautiful tune, is one of the many delightful details that make up this patch-work composition. The variety of songs and cryes is bewildering.”

Foundations of Music

BY

H. J. WATT, D. PHIL.,

Lecturer on Psychology in the University of Glasgow.

Royal 8vo, 18s. net.

"Dr. Watt has written a really fine analysis of the psychological data of music. His study is based on the observed reactions to musical sounds; he endeavours to ascertain the psychological and physical equivalents to æsthetic rules—to show the meaning and justification, in the scientific sense, of such rules. The current confusion about such matters makes such an analysis very welcome, and Dr. Watt is to be congratulated on the clear, patient, and thorough manner in which he has performed his task."—The Athenæum.

THE

YORK GATE, MARYLEBONE ROAD, N.W. 1.

INSTITUTED 1822.

INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER, 1830.

Patron: HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

President: H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT AND STRATHEARN, K.G.

PRINCIPAL—SIR ALEXANDER CAMPBELL MACKENZIE, Mus.D., LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.A.M.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC offers to students of both sexes (whether amateur or professional) a thorough training in all branches of music under the most able and distinguished Professors. In addition to receiving individual lessons in the various branches of the Curriculum, students have the advantage of attending the Orchestral, Choral, and Chamber Music Classes, and the weekly Lectures on music and musicians. Evidence of their progress is given at the Fortnightly and Public Concerts and by periodical Operatic and Dramatic Performances.

There are three Terms in the Academic year—viz., the Michaelmas Term, from Michaelmas to Christmas; the Lent Term, from early in January to Easter; and the Midsummer Term, from early in May until the end of July.

A large number of Scholarships and Prizes are founded and are competed for periodically.

Students who show special merit and ability receive the distinction of being elected by the Directors, Associates of the Institution, and are thereby entitled to the use after their names of the letters A.R.A.M. Students who distinguish themselves in the musical profession after quitting the Institution may be elected by the Directors, Fellows of the Royal Academy of Music, and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the letters F.R.A.M.

Subscribers have the privilege of attending the Lectures and Public Concerts and of introducing friends in proportion to the amount of their subscriptions.

An examination of persons trained independently of the Academy is held twice a year—viz., during the Summer and Christmas vacations—successful candidates at which are elected Licentiates of the Academy, and are thereupon entitled to the use after their names of the letters L.R.A.M. The syllabus is issued annually at Easter.

A Special Teachers' Training Course, to meet the requirements of the Teachers' Registration Council, has been instituted, prospectus of which is now ready.

A JUNIOR DEPARTMENT is now open.

Prospectus, entry form, and all further information may be obtained on application.

Marshall & Rose

SUPERB GRAND & UPRIGHT PIANOFORTES

THE PIANOS WHICH INSPIRE

THOSE who purchase the Superb Marshall and Rose Pianoforte can always be confident that their instrument will win the highest measure of praise on account of its superlatively sympathetic qualities. The Marshall and Rose Pianoforte in the making has been treated with the same care and tenderness as a rare violin; it is the supreme outcome of years of experience and steady striving after an ideal; every part of it has literally been trained towards perfection, and the result is an instrument which is almost human in its responsiveness.

The artist who avails himself of this wonderful instrument as a means of self-expression will find that his message never fails in its appeal when given to an audience in such an exceptional manner. Real connoisseurs of Music are convinced that the magic and beauty of the immortal works of the great Composers can only be adequately realised when interpreted on the Piano of Perfection—the instrument which bears the name of MARSHALL AND ROSE.

The Marshall and Rose Grand and Upright Pianofortes can also be obtained containing THE WORLD-FAMED ANGELUS PIANO-PLAYER, which gives you a Piano possessing every musical quality and the ability to play it.

How to play difficult music with ease. . . .

Pianists who wish to play the music which affords the greatest enjoyment and relaxation—the compositions of the world's greatest musicians—and who are averse to the drudgery of wearisome keyboard practising in order to obtain the necessary technical proficiency, will find the "Brain to Keyboard" method of the greatest possible help.

Practice on this system, much of it away from the keyboard, is never wearisome, and after some weeks of it, spending quite a short time every day, a degree of technical proficiency is obtained which would be otherwise impossible, even after years of keyboard practising for several hours daily.

Sir FREDERICK BRIDGE, C.V.O., has strongly recommended my System, the advantages of which, he stated, he could cordially endorse from his own personal experience. More than 12,000 successful students add their testimony.

"From Brain to Keyboard"

Macdonald Smith's System
of Pianoforte Playing.

My illustrated book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing," will be gladly sent to any pianist. It fully explains the principles and advantages of the methods used in the System. When applying, please state whether comparative beginner, average or advanced pianist. The book will be sent free of charge, and post free.

RECITAL-LECTURES ON VOCAL EASE.

The vocalist who is singing with undue effort, with a feeling of "use-of-throat," is wrong. Frontal position, as in speech, and correct breath-use to maintain that frontal position—this is what is usually termed "Italian production." It is as much English as Italian. An English soprano and a foreign baritone were the only two artists whose words came over the footlights at Covent Garden one particular night recently. Their voices rang clear and true. Why? Because they used them in a natural, easy, manner, as in speech. The soprano has been singing twenty-five years and her voice is still pure and fresh. She was trained in England.

Nottingham Guardian, March 23, 1920. "A delightful demonstration of vocal art, supplemented by sound advice to musical aspirants, Mr. Tree sang a series of songs to reveal his breadth of style and power of voice control. The ease and naturalness of his work were quite as instructive as his verbal counsel, and there must have been many in the audience who learned a good deal by force of example alone. Such vital points as correct enunciation and the avoidance of any tendency to "throatiness" were explained, and the correct methods clearly defined."

Nottingham Journal: The great secret of prolonging life of the voice was ease in singing. He demonstrated his theory by magnificent renderings of songs by Moussorgsky, Walford Davies, Herman, Stanford, &c.

The College provides INSTRUCTION and TRAINING in all Musical Subjects (Instrumental, Vocal, and Theoretical) and Elocution. The lessons are arranged to meet the convenience of both day and evening students. Entry may be made for any number of Subjects—from one to the Full Course. The College is open to beginners as well as to the more proficient student: pupils under 16 years of age are received for the Junior School at reduced fees.

An Approved Special Course for the Training of Music Teachers has been instituted to meet the requirements of the Teachers' Registration Council.

The ORCHESTRAL, CHORAL, the OPERATIC, and CHAMBER MUSIC CLASSES are open also to sufficiently competent persons who are not College students for other subjects.

Tuition in the Rudiments of the Theory of Music, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Instrumentation, Composition, and the Art of Teaching is also given by Correspondence.

There are between Forty and Fifty Scholarships tenable at the College and open to all British subjects up to certain age limits, and the Cambridge Pianoforte Scholarship, value £100 per annum; also Eighteen Scholarships which provide complete preparation for the Degree of Bachelor of Music.

Particulars of the Teaching Department, with list of Professors, Fees, Scholarships regulations, &c., Admission Cards to Concerts, and the Syllabuses of the Higher and Local Examinations, free on application to the undersigned.

THE SYMPHONIC WORKS OF W. H. BELL

BY M. VAN SOMEREN-GODFREY

In the period 1916-19, W. H. Bell has contributed three compositions of big calibre in symphonic literature—a set of Symphonic Variations in G, and two Symphonies, No. 2 in A, and No. 3 in F. The usual charge of neglecting their countrymen's work cannot be brought against British conductors in this case, as the works are still in MS., and have not yet been introduced into England. This, however, will shortly be remedied, and at least one of the scores will be available in print, which is fortunate, as there can be little doubt as to the real value of all three works.

The production of symphonies of outstanding worth is all too rare; yet the writer, while wishing to avoid comparisons, cannot help recording his firm conviction that these works may be classed with the best of their kind, whether amongst old or new. This statement will perhaps be regarded as unduly optimistic. It is made, however, with due deliberation, after a careful study of the scores, and after hearing the compositions in question performed in juxtaposition with symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, César Franck, and Glazounov. Reasons for such a decision may be briefly summarised in the composer's

(a) Power of invention of beautiful subject-matter, having at once individuality and possibilities of development along with sufficient strength to bear the weight of the work that is to be built upon it;

(b) Ability to handle this material, and to mould it into one of the large forms of orchestral composition in which music reaches its highest expression as a mode of logical thought. This implies a mastery of form, economy of means, and, above all, sincerity.

Each work is absolute music as apart from programme music. Although complex in structure, there is complete absence of eccentricity or mannerism, and the present writer feels that their sanity and general dignity of atmosphere (though humour is by no means absent) must soon win for them a lasting place, if they are once given a chance of becoming well known.

So far performances have been limited to Cape Town, where the Symphonies were written. Fine renderings have been achieved notwithstanding the fact that the Municipal Orchestra is far too small effectively to cope with such fully scored compositions.

The modernity of these works lies in their texture, and it is from this point of view that first performances may seem baffling to those who have not heard much new music. Their style is very contrapuntal, and the instrumental grouping unconventional. Thus, though no special harmonic trait is noticeable, as in Scriabin's later orchestral poems, the web of sound is often quite new to the ear, in spite of the material being largely diatonic. Much light has been thrown on the subject in the chapters on 'Texture' in Sir Hubert Parry's 'Style in Musical Art.' No better introduction to the study of modern orchestration could be imagined.

From these general considerations we may pass to the individual works. Some indulgence must be craved for the music examples. These have mostly been confined to thematic material, owing to the impossibility of presenting any adequate idea of the actual instrumentation in the space available. The works will be taken in the chronological order of their composition.

SYMPHONIC VARIATIONS.

This work was first produced in August, 1917, by the Cape Town Municipal Orchestra, under Theo. Wendt. There have been two subsequent performances, and there would doubtless have been others—for one cannot imagine that a man of Wendt's enterprise would let such a fine thing rest—but for the fact that war exigencies sadly reduced the orchestral personnel. Reconstruction will however take place here, as elsewhere.

The Variations now to be described are a second version, which is to be their final form. After one performance of the original, the composer entirely recast them, retaining little but the theme—surely an example of real doggedness.

The score, bearing the date 1916-17, is the longest and most intricate of the three under consideration. Of about the same length, and of as sincere intention, it accomplishes in absolute music much that Strauss has done in his 'Don Quixote,' with the notable difference that the grotesque element is relegated.

Adapting the variation form to his own needs the composer has set an excellent model for the future. The traditional form of orchestral variations leaves much to be desired. The break between each variation is a serious defect from the listener's point of view, and is not in accordance with the spirit of the times. Bell has avoided any such stilted form. His work falls into three sections; an Introduction, the Variations themselves, eighteen in number, and a Finale. Throughout there is no break, each section and each variation leading naturally into the next, though there are many changes of time-signature and of pace, the latter being mostly gradual. The orchestra employed is large, comprising three flutes (piccolo), two oboes, cor anglais, three clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassoons, double-bassoon, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, glockenspiel, triangle, xylophone, Indian drum, timpani, bass-drum, cymbals, celesta, harp, and strings.

The Introduction, opening solemnly in G minor, Poco adagio 4-4, consists of an exposition of the thematic material employed, other than the main theme. This is made up of a number of short motifs, (a) to (e), given in the order of their appearance:

Poco Adagio.
Tromboni.

(b)
Vl. I. & II. (Unison.)

(c)
Cor. & Fag.
Vl. & Viole.

(d)
Celli. e Bassi.

(e)
Vl. I. & II. (Unison.) &c.

These all occur within the first few bars, both singly and in combination, and continually appear throughout the work in various forms. They are worked up with increasing pace to a big fortissimo for the whole orchestra, which calms down for the announcement of the main theme (f):

(f) Allegro moderato.

which has already been foreshadowed in (a) and (e). This is given out by a solo trumpet under a high tremolo of divisi strings. Purely diatonic harmonies are used, but a delightful colour is obtained by pizzicato strings in unison with the trumpet, and a short figure on the celesta, imitated by the flutes. The beautiful theme deserves special study, as the whole genius of the work is centred in it. Attention may be drawn to:

- (a) Its simple diatonic nature and obvious suitability for development;
- (b) Its perfect balance, combined with an absence of squareness of rhythm;
- (c) Its characteristic octave leaps.

The three following variations consist of a repetition of the theme without change of key or rhythm, but with contrasted orchestration. In each case the first bar of the new variation overlaps the cadence of the previous one. The tonality and theme having been well established, the remaining variations proceed to throw new light on the latter from many points of view, and it is developed through continuous changes of rhythm, tempo, and tonality. It would be idle to attempt to follow this in detail within the limitations of this article. The work must be heard. Its outstanding feature is continuity of evolution, a quality that can hardly be conveyed in a written description, and one to which the Variations owe much of their greatness.

Attention may be directed to a few outstanding points. Variations Nos. 6 and 7 are in free rhythm, the time-signatures employing 3-4, 4-4, 5-4 and 2-4 tempi, and changing in nearly every bar. A variant of the theme from this section is used in the Fugue in the Finale. Part of the exposition of this is given in (g). Nos. 8 and 9, in waltz rhythms, are comparatively lightly scored, and take the place of a Scherzo in a Symphony. No. 10 is built on a ground bass of the first three notes of the theme, repeated by the trombones. Nos. 16 and 17 are of an Oriental atmosphere, with a repeated figure on the Indian drum and effective short solos for violin and 'cello.

In No. 18 much is heard of the harp, celesta, glockenspiel, and triangle in combination. This leads into the Finale. Here a new colour is introduced by the xylophone—a rare visitor in serious scores—and further extended use is made of all the percussion instruments playing piano. A reprise of motifs from the various sections works up to the biggest climax of the work, molto appassionato. This is followed by a fugal treatment of the variant of the theme to which reference has already been made:

After some further working out, a long diminuendo leads to a pianissimo restatement of the theme on the flute, with the lightest possible accompaniment. With this, so to speak, tender farewell to the theme, a masterly work ends.

EXPRESSION AND DICTION

BY AGNES J. LARKCOM

The art of expression rests entirely upon sympathy and understanding. It should be studied from first principles, and not from isolated examples of poetry and music. Words and musical signs are inadequate to convey all the meaning which lies behind the concrete signs and symbols. Only by insight and imagination can we ever hope to interpret the real meaning of great poets and musicians. Our ambition ought to be to train and develop our resources until we are able in some degree to enter into their state of mind, to see from their point of view, share their emotions, and rise to their ideals. If we accept this conclusion, it will be seen at once that no one can adequately express the ideas of the great unless he has the germs of their ideas in himself. It is hopeless for the mean, limited, and coarse to think they can ever put before us the measure of the refined and lofty soul. The mirror only reflects perfectly when it is true—the string only responds to its own period of vibration.

A fine artist interpreter, then, may be considered to contain in himself the same kind of capacities for feeling and expression as those which animate the creative genius whose works he seeks to interpret. The latter is probably more specially gifted in power of observation, concentration, constructive ability, and skill in statement; but the differences cannot be great in kind, though they may be considerable in degree. It is pitiful to see the frivolous, petty, uneducated singer or performer struggling with the masterpieces of Art. He can never reach their heights. Imagination, character, and education are the first necessities for the student of really fine art, and we need not concern ourselves with the wants of those whose ambitions are satisfied with lower levels of achievement.

It is somewhat difficult to define 'beauty' or explain what is meant by a work of fine art. People often say: 'Beauty is only a convention—one person thinks a thing beautiful which another considers hideous.' Yet beauty is very real indeed. The much-quoted line of Keats: 'A thing of beauty is a joy for ever,' may perhaps give us the solution of the problem. Those things are beautiful which stimulate the higher emotions and give us that ineffable uplifted sensation of which we are all conscious at times. It is the kind of rapture we experience when in the presence of some of the marvels of nature, or when we are impressed by the wonderful majesty of noble architecture, fine music, or inspired poetry. For a brief space something exquisite seems to be added to life which no amount of physical pleasure can ever give. It is the momentary union of the spirit with the ideal and the infinite, towards which it blindly and feebly gropes through the greater part of existence.

When this stimulation and exaltation are caused by seeing or hearing or understanding something produced by human agency, we can consider that production to be a work of fine art.

I have spoken of education as being necessary to the interpretative artist, and side by side with education of the mind must go the training of the physical organs employed in voice-production. After the lungs and throat have been developed and strengthened, the articulatory organs need very definite attention from the singer. Good and beautiful diction is interpretation's skilled hand-maiden. By diction I mean the correct pronunciation and clear enunciation of words, added to a way of expressing them which conveys their full spiritual value clearly and truly to the mind of the listener. Words may be sung distinctly but not beautifully, beautifully but not distinctly, or both beautifully and distinctly but not expressively. Occasionally when listening to some of the shining lights of the music-hall stage I have been amazed and perhaps envious of the sharp clearness with which every word fell on the ear, while at the same time the effect was often ugly and unpleasant. Clarity alone does not satisfy us. Words seem to have a life of their own. Every inflection of the voice affects their importance.

Mood is suggested by the colour of the vowels, but consonants are the real means of expression. Every emotion affects the physical condition more or less, and the results of that affection are apparent in the way we enunciate our words.

The vocal artist must study the effects of emotion on the articulatory organs, and by careful observation and practice become capable of reproducing at will the same conditions as those which are the spontaneous outcome of real feeling.

The letters of the English alphabet can be roughly divided into three groups. These overlap a little, but are good enough to work from. The first group contains all the vowels or sound carriers. A vowel technically is a vocal sound that passes through a tube which varies in shape but is always open and unobstructed. The second group includes all the voiced consonants, i.e., the consonants which need vocal tone to form them, but which are always heard through an obstruction such as the lips in m, the tongue and teeth in th, the teeth and lower lip in v, &c., &c.

The third group includes the aspirates, hisses, and nearly all the explosives, such as s, sh, f, t, p, k, ch. It will be noticed that these are little noises which interrupt the flow of vocal continuity. The few consonants which do not quite fall into these groups are b, d, g, and j. These are explosives, but have a faint vocal quality. They are not sustainable. The student ought to practise these instruments of expression separately, assiduously, and carefully. The colour of vowels should be varied, and different degrees of length and energy should be given to the consonants until they become his perfect and obedient servants.

A good deal of beautiful vocal expression is the result of intuitive feeling and sympathy, but I think the teacher ought to study the expression of the emotions scientifically. Such things as love, joy, fear, anger, and indignation have signs with which we are all familiar. Language is full of such expressions as: 'Her face relaxed into a smile'; 'His face contracted into a frown'; 'He set his teeth and clenched his hands with rage,' &c. Rage and anger are accompanied by the contraction which precedes a spring or violent movement. Fear is shown by shrinking, joy by a kind of expansion, while all the soft and sympathetic emotions are accompanied by a state of relaxation and flexibility. One or two examples may be useful. Watch a mother fondling a little child. Each movement is tender and gentle so as not to cause the least discomfort. Every muscle seems to become a soft pillow for the darling little head or limbs. Then the voice—the vowels take on an added roundness and sweetness; the voiced consonants are dwelt on and prolonged, while the explosives are softened down or completely suppressed. How familiar are we with the lisping baby-talk of a fond mother, and how instinctively in our turn we all resort to it!

We can also see the soothing effects of rocking, rhythmic movements. Sudden noises, harsh sounds, and stiff positions are all foreign to the expression of love and protective tenderness.

How different is the expression of anger! When we are indignant, whether for good or evil reasons, we want to do something. There is first a drawing together rigidly, a momentary pause, then the sound bursts forth. The explosive consonants shake, and arouse, and excite. Everything tends to disturb tranquillity and inspire to action. Then fear: This emotion is accompanied by an instinctive desire not to be seen or heard. We shrink physically, and if obliged to speak, resort to the use of such words as do not need or involve the use of much vocal power. Soft hisses and aspirates are used—every sound that does not travel far. Round, rich vowels need broad, open resonators. The sensation of fear makes contraction inevitable, so every vowel will reflect a weakened resonance, and consonants which need energetic movements will be kept in the background.

The sentiment of awe is allied to that of fear, but is not quite the same—it includes reverence. In 'Elijah' the words of the Angel: 'Thy face must be veiled, for He draweth near,' always seem to me to suggest the complex feeling of awe very beautifully. How the idea of the nearness of God can be made to envelop us by the sensitive appreciation of a reverent artist—how thrilling are the words when they drop from the lips of a great singer!

The technical study of letters and words reminds us that it is customary to speak of some languages as being 'vocal' or easy to sing, and some as being unvocal or tiring. Modern languages are generally classified as to their 'vocal' position in this order: Italian, French, English, German. This is fairly correct, but I am inclined to say that English is very little, if at all, less vocal than Italian or French, provided it is properly practised and its possibilities understood. The language which is easiest to sing will be found to be one in which vowel sounds predominate; that which is most difficult, the one which possesses most of those consonants which involve a break of vocal continuity. It is not the continuous effort that tires so much as the starting and stopping of a movement. We know this is the case in everything—even a simple walk will be fatiguing if we constantly stop and go on again. When this happens in singing there is a little jerk of the larynx which, if frequently repeated, will tire the throat and make us uncomfortable.

The reason I have for advocating the necessity for practising the voiced consonants is that, not only are they most effective and useful means of expression, but when properly sung they do not interfere with the continuity of vocal effort, and they render English easy and agreeable to sing. English is rich in vowels (it possesses six more than Italian and only three less than French). Most of the faults met with in English singers' diction arise from a want of interest in and appreciation of the beauties of their own tongue which is characteristically British. Hence the common idea that English is difficult to sing. It is not; it becomes so only from ignorance and inattention. The wise singer will study vowels with loving care, voiced consonants with tender regard, and the other consonants with due appreciation of their possibilities. He will avoid fatigue by making the most of the vowels and voiced consonants, and so never break off the sound unnecessarily. If these directions are followed, it will be found that English is one of the best languages for the singer. It is clear, strong, varied, and musical, and there is no reason why it should be mouthed and distorted as it so frequently is. English possesses the unique advantage of being a blend of two widely differing types of speech—Latin and Teutonic. It can express the sweetness and subtlety of the south as easily as the strength and vitality of the north. The people of a country make the idiom, and the idiom in turn helps to mould the people. The English language reflects the morals, emotions, and intellectual activities of a highly imaginative, tenacious, and vigorous people, and we ought to be proud of it. If we live up to the level of the language of Shakespeare, Tennyson, Alice Meynell, and Rupert Brooke, we ought to be able to express in speech and in song every noble thought and beautiful emotion of which humanity is capable.

To those students who wish to become real artist-interpreters, I must once more say that they should not only understand and sympathise with the thought and aims of great poets and musicians, but they must study the technique of the art of diction, or their attempts at expression will probably sound affected and artificial. They must learn that true expression rests on fundamental laws. They must associate certain states of mind with particular physical conditions, and remember that the voice faithfully reflects those conditions, and ought to be able to express through the words the emotion which causes them. The student must also cultivate the power of passing rapidly and completely from one state of feeling to another, and he should remember the French proverb, Tout comprendre, c'est tout pardonner. If he really understands perfectly, he may allow himself to sympathise temporarily even with a Nero or a Jezebel, and still call his soul his own.

By this will appear quite clearly what I consider to be the most important thing in the art of teaching singing. It is training. The mind, the will, the emotions, the physical organs, are all susceptible of training. We may not be able to evolve new powers in the sojourners of the classroom, but with skill and patience we can so develop their resources that success becomes possible to many who at first seemed unpromising or destined to failure. Imagination, patience, and sympathy are useful to everyone; they are essential to the teacher. He should realise that in order to understand emotion properly and interpret it intelligently, the artist needs a cultivated mind, a vivid imagination, and wide and varied sympathies, as well as a finely trained voice. The attention of the pupil should therefore be turned towards all that is good, beautiful, and interesting in life, art, and science. His energies should not be entirely absorbed in his own special study. The good teacher should not seek to impose his own individuality on that of the student, but should strive to awaken interest, stimulate activity, and point the way towards the path of self-development, or as Maria Montessori beautifully puts it, 'He should show a light and pass on his way.'

MODERN BRITISH COMPOSERS

BY EDWIN EVANS

X.—RALPH VAUGHAN WILLIAMS (contd.)

It is impossible to pass in review the works of Vaughan Williams in the chronological order which furnishes so useful a plan with other composers. In the first place, whereas their development has been consistent in the sense that their various musical ideas have marched as it were abreast, Vaughan Williams's progress has been less ordered. In some aspects his work at a very early date shows an astonishing finality, whilst in others it still lacks to-day the finish that we expect to find in a composer at his stage of maturity. Moreover, his passion for revision leaves us constantly in doubt concerning the date of certain of his most characteristic works. Should they be assigned to the year in which they originated, or to that in which they reached their present form? Even when they have been standardised by publication, it does not always follow that their evolution is terminated. No order in which we could place them would present his compositions in such a sequence as would constitute in itself a biography of his musical life, and the variety of his musical experience defies systematic classification. It is one of those rare instances in which the apparently fortuitous selection of more or less cognate suggestions offers the prospect of a result at least as illuminating as any logical process.

In the preceding article we arrived at a group of his early songs, which furnishes as good a starting-point as any other. Generally speaking his songs reached print more rapidly than any of his other works, and this arrested the process of revision. But on examining them carefully, we realise that it is precisely his songs which furnished the least occasion for afterthought. Though not each one of them is perfect in itself, all of them convey a convincing impression that they are an adequate presentment of the musical thought as it came to him. This is an impression that we do not always derive even from his most deliberate work in other spheres, where we are constantly assailed by doubts whether he could not have given fuller expression to what was in his mind—doubts, by the way, which the composer himself constantly shares. Two other songs of early date deserve mention, 'Orpheus with his lute,' for its old-world charm, and 'Boy Johnny,' for its simple directness. Then followed the 'Songs of Travel,' of which the first book contains the most popular, which are 'The Vagabond,' 'Bright is the Ring of Words' and 'The Roadside Fire.' About the same time he arranged two old French songs, one of which has a melody which places its anonymous author among the elect of musical history. It is the song 'L'Amour de Moy,' which is sometimes, but quite erroneously, described as a folk-tune. Its essentially aristocratic character should have sufficed to show that its origin could not be the popular Muse. But there is a general tendency to regard all the songs of old France, not excluding even those which can be traced to the Troubadours, as folk-songs, equally with those whose rustic character is obvious. No peasant, or other untutored man of the people, has ever sung such a song as 'L'Amour de Moy.'

Not long afterwards, Vaughan Williams harmonized two volumes belonging to the series 'Folk-Songs of England' issued by Messrs. Novello. Here I find myself on somewhat dangerous ground, for the mode of accompaniment is very different from that which appeals to my personal taste. But while frankly saying so, I am not blind to the sterling quality of the method which the composer has applied, viewing these songs from another angle. It is only the fanatics of the folk-song world who arrogate to themselves the right of declaring how these old melodies should be set, and the example they give of exclusiveness is one to be avoided. Vaughan Williams gives the songs a becoming sturdiness, and preserves their original character, some of which would have had to be sacrificed had he considered it necessary to accommodate them to the purposes of ordinary song. That he has been uncompromising with the songs themselves is a circumstance that I bow to, but I wish that he could have compromised more in favour of the instrument for which the accompaniments are written. They are good intrinsically, but few of them make an effective use of pianistic resource, such as for instance Moullé has employed in his 'Songs of Normandy,' which are a classic in the genre.

The next important work in song form was the cycle 'On Wenlock Edge,' to which I devoted an article in these columns in June, 1918. It consists of six poems selected from Housman's 'A Shropshire Lad,' and set for voice with string quartet and pianoforte. This remarkable composition dates from the composer's association with Ravel, of which there are subtle traces in most of the songs, and a more obvious one in 'Bredon Hill.' Yet this extraneous influence is so completely confined to what one may term the scenic accessories of the music that, even were it most apparent, it carries with it no feeling of intrusion. One of the mysteries of our English musical life of ten years ago was, however, that a composer might model himself upon certain approved German classics and not incur reproach for following what was then considered to be the right and proper course, but if he had the audacity to profit by experience of another source, it was considered a lapse from virtue. Happily we are forgetting those prejudices, and they are only worth mentioning as historical curiosities. For that matter, 'On Wenlock Edge,' like any other music, has its genealogy, with a collateral branch extending even into Germany, but in a more intimate sense it is almost as English as the poems themselves. Had it been written ten years later, even that 'almost' might have been unjustified, but Vaughan Williams was a pioneer, and therefore subject to the criticism of those who have become wise after the event. The essential fact is that this song-cycle is a thing of great beauty, a beauty that is almost universally acknowledged, and a beauty that its trifling defects cannot mar if indeed they do not help to bring out its better features. The voice-part is so characteristic that we are prepared to condone one or two declamatory weaknesses, and even the obviousness of the antithesis in 'Is my team ploughing?' In short, this is one of the outstanding works in modern British music, in a form in which English music happened to have more leeway to catch up than in any other. Whilst our orchestral and chamber music was rapidly making up for lost time, the problem of writing English song made very slow progress towards a solution which even now is not yet attained to the satisfaction of the more fastidious critic. But when a point is reached whence we can look back with satisfaction over the stages of the journey, it will be surprising indeed if 'On Wenlock Edge' ceases to appear a prominent landmark. In comparison, the 'Five Mystical Songs' which followed may have a harder task to maintain themselves in the répertoire, partly because their ascetic treatment does not appeal to popular instincts, and partly because their setting with chorus and orchestra stands in the way of frequent performance. But though planned on the larger scale, corresponding to that of the Fantasia on Christmas Carols, their place is among the composer's songs rather than among his larger works.

The latest addition to this section of Vaughan Williams's works consists of four hymns for tenor solo and string orchestra, or alternatively with pianoforte and viola, which are not yet published, but from which the following, though taken from the instrumental background, may be given as a characteristic example:

No. 3, 'COME LOVE, COME LORD.'

(Part of Introduction).

VI. (con sord.)

Turning to Vaughan Williams's choral works, we have first of all to decide as to which category belong certain very important compositions. The 'Sea Symphony,' for instance, is essentially what its title indicates, a symphony of the sea. That it should employ voices, and be based upon a poem, in no way alters its symphonic character. Moreover, it is often in the purely orchestral passages that the music gives forth its most characteristic flavour. The greater part of the choral writing is by no means so distinctly personal. Although its idiom, and especially its disregard for certain rigid conventions of the past, give it an aspect of novelty, its innermost feeling does not differentiate itself from previous music to the same degree as the orchestral writing. In many respects 'Towards the Unknown Region,' which preceded the 'Sea Symphony,' has a stronger claim to be considered a representative choral work, although the latter is in all else a more notable achievement. The following examples, culled from two different sections of the 'Sea Symphony,' may be regarded as typical:

"THE EXPLORERS."

'ON THE BEACH AT NIGHT ALONE.'

Ex. 3. misterioso. This musical example consists of two systems of piano accompaniment. The first system is marked pp and features a melody in the right hand with triplets and a more active bass line. The second system continues the piece, maintaining the pp dynamic and featuring similar triplet patterns in the right hand.

As might be expected, it is in unaccompanied part-writing that Vaughan Williams shows most plainly the harmonic austerity to which reference was made in the preceding article as being the only feature that could be singled out for technical discussion. The following two examples from a Latin Motet, though not selected for that particular purpose, afford an illustration of it:

Ex. 4A. 'O VOS OMNES'

Andantino.
SOPRANO.

Ex. 4A. Andantino. SOPRANO. This example shows a vocal line for Soprano. The lyrics are: "O vos omnes . . . qui tran-sit-is per Vi-am at-ten-di-te et vi-". The music is in 4/4 time and features a simple, direct melody with some rests.

Ex. 4B. This example shows the vocal lines for Alto, Tenor, and Bass. The lyrics are: "de-te . . . Si est dol-or . . . si-cut dol-or me-us". The music is in 4/4 time and features a simple, direct melody with some rests.

END OF SAME MOTET

Ex. 4B. SOPRANO. This example shows the vocal lines for Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass. The lyrics are: "Je-ru-sa-lem, Je-ru-sa-lem, . . . Je-ru-sa-lem, . . .". The music is in 4/4 time and features a simple, direct melody with some rests.

Ex. 4C. This example shows the vocal lines for Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass. The lyrics are: "con-ver-ter-e ad Dom-i-num De-um tu-um. Dom-i-num De-um tu-um. um tu-um. um tu-um. um". The music is in 4/4 time and features a simple, direct melody with some rests.

They are Vaughan Williams in his most ascetic mood—that is to say, in a mood which, though not always so freely displayed, is at all times the background of his harmony. If we can imagine a form of asceticism which involves no self-denial, and is congenial not only to the man who practises it but to those who enter into communion with him through his music, we shall not be far from a complete understanding of the essence of Vaughan Williams's compositions, and not least of those which have at various times been regarded as somewhat forbidding because of the absence of concession to the more florid amenities of music.

The composer's preoccupation with folk-song found its fullest expression in the 'Norfolk Rhapsodies.' These are three in number, and were originally planned to form a kind of folk-song symphony, but the composer has decided to discard the third and is doubtful about the second, which may be overtaken by the same fate unless its friends intervene. The first Rhapsody is based upon five tunes which Vaughan Williams collected whilst staying at King's Lynn in January, 1905. It was composed the same year, and performed for the first time during the Promenade Concert season of 1906. The five tunes are all of a type that is more or less common to our seafaring folk, regardless of county. Some of them could be matched from the West Country. The titles are: 'The Captain's Apprentice,' 'The Bold Young Sailor,' 'A Basket of Eggs,' 'On Board a Ninety-eight,' and 'Ward, the Pirate.' In the original plan this Rhapsody corresponded to the introduction and first movement of the symphony, the former being derived from the first two, and the Allegro from the last three of these songs. Though the form is fanciful enough to justify the designation 'Rhapsody,' it is logical and even concise, the material being ingeniously combined and developed. The second and third Rhapsodies were composed in 1906, and first performed at the Cardiff Festival of 1907. The second telescopes the slow movement and Scherzo of the projected symphony, the latter being treated as an episode of the former. The third, in the form of a quick march and Trio, was the Finale, but since it no longer has the composer's approval, the symphony must remain truncated. In these two later Rhapsodies the composer employs respectively three and four tunes from the same source.

Of somewhat similar character is the 'Fantasia on English Folk-Song' which bears the sub-title 'Studies for an English Ballad Opera,' though whether this refers to the work given in the list of Vaughan Williams's compositions as 'Hugh, the Drover,' has not been disclosed. The Fantasia is in three sections—a resolute Allegro, an extended slow movement, and a lively Finale, towards the end of which the earlier material reappears. Though not based upon folk-song, the fantasias on a theme by Tallis for string orchestra, and on Christmas carols for baritone solo, chorus and orchestra, belong to a related order of ideas in their treatment of given themes. The method naturally derives from variations, but instead of the more formal exploitation the composer constantly fuses his material into an organic whole. Except that his polyphony is radically different, and his invention more spontaneous, his works of this class bear a faint resemblance to those which Russian composers have based upon their country's rich store of folk-tune. But though the impulse may have this resemblance, nothing could have induced Vaughan Williams to emulate the machine-made overtures and symphonies of that movement which time has already dated.

Among Vaughan Williams's other orchestral works are three Impressions which, though not indebted to folk-song, are so intimately associated with the English soil that this is the right place to mention them. The first two, 'Harnham Down' and 'Boldrewood,' date from 1904. They are overshadowed in importance by the symphonic Impression 'In the Fen Country,' composed in 1904, revised in 1905 and 1907, and first performed at a Beecham concert in 1909. Unfortunately the score of this characteristic work has been lost, perhaps irretrievably. It is a quietly poetic composition in the style of a landscape, without incident, whether musical or anecdotal, save such as is provided by a gradual succession, not of moods, but of shades of the same mood. The melodic lines are such as one associates with a pastoral scene, but Vaughan Williams has endowed them with a rare personal quality. 'In the Fen Country' is a treasured memory with those who had the good fortune to hear it. Its loss is one more reminder that much of the best English music remains unpublished, and therefore exposed to all the risk that can beset a single manuscript score on its many journeys.

Interludes

By 'FESTE'

Mr. Thomas Quinlan's article in a recent issue of the Daily Telegraph under the heading 'Wake up, England!' has apparently attracted less attention than it deserved. Mr. Quinlan expressed a fear that we shall be inundated by American artists and managers with 'more up-to-date methods than our own,' with more interesting programmes, and with 'keener and more intelligent commercial insight from the point of view of the artist's own advancement.'

'In America,' he said, 'it is impossible to find an artist who is not prepared to deluge a manager with newspaper blocks, press cuttings, photographs, and all the driving force of American advertising methods.'

No one can dispute our backwardness in these respects. Far too many of our artists seem to be under the impression that engagements will come without their moving heaven and earth—especially earth. They are encouraged in this attitude by our musical press, which seems curiously deficient in the 'driving force' which is so characteristic of American journals.

Perhaps the first thing that strikes us is our want of system. When I take up an American musical journal (which I do as often as my eyes light on one), and read an account of Rex M. Spielmann's successful recital (headed 'Rex M. Spielmann Reaps New Honors at Savannah, Ga.'). I know I shall hear some more about Rex before the journal is laid aside. Sure thing, as Rex would say, for a few pages on he smiles at me from the middle of an advertisement that left him very little change out of twenty dollars. On the opposite page, also smiling, is 'Cicely van Peake, Coloratura Soprano,' surrounded by brief rhapsodies extracted from press notices of her performances. Overleaf, my eye is caught by and I take off my hat to the excellent system which ensures that the activities of advertisers shall not be passed over in the scandalous way common in England. In the journal for which I am now writing, for example, there is a deplorable failure to realise the close connection that should exist between the pages devoted to news and those containing advertisements. There is perhaps some excuse in the case of an organ so old established that it finds some difficulty in adapting itself to modern methods, but those of more recent origin have no defence. I do not know a single musical journal in this country that guarantees to those advertising in its columns a handsome or even fair return in the shape of favourable notice.

Of our attempts in the direction of interviewing it is difficult to speak with restraint. We discourage frankness in the interviewee, and generally manage to serve up the matter in as dull a style as possible. And yet we have no lack of good models. I open the New York Musical Courier of March 18 almost at random, and light upon an interview full of the kind of thing that we never see in our native journals. We have much to learn even in regard to headlines and titles. If the Musical Times interviewed Miss Mary Garden the result would be curtly headed 'Mary Garden.' When a representative of the Courier calls on her, we hear all about it in no uncertain way.

"NEW YORK CRITICS ARE ALL DRIED UP OLD MEN" SAYS MARY GARDEN

Thus the Courier headline, in half-inch capitals. Nor is it the only one. There are three more batches of them, in letters of diminishing size, the last lot giving us a précis of the interview. These hors d'œuvres occupy space equal to about a page of the Musical Times, and never was space put to more telling purpose.

Our interviewers fail, too, in rarely beginning at the beginning. This Courier man knows the importance of putting first things first. He tells us his object in calling on 'the brilliant artist . . . and also her no less fascinating sister in their apartment at the Copley-Plaza in Boston,' and then proceeds:

'Two o'clock had just struck when the reporter rang and was immediately admitted.

His entrance was perhaps too abrupt, as the ladies made a quick exit and left him somewhat surprised on the threshold of their beautiful parlor. So while waiting he noticed on the table two classic books, and a pack of cards half dealt out revealed that one of the ladies had been busily engaged in a game of solitaire. On the piano was the score of "Carmen," opened at the card scene. There were no pictures on the wall, and only a small bouquet of baby roses and four water lilies gave to the hotel room a homelike air.

'Returning to the room, Miss Garden excused herself, and the astute reporter noticed a change of gown and a little powder on her lovely nose. She began laughingly: "You see I had to make a quick change, as after a rehearsal one returns home rather grimy. So you want an interview? What about?"'

Few English editors appreciate detail of this kind, especially of the nose-powder variety.

They shy, too, at the colloquial. Thus we may be sure that the following racy passage would have been frowned on. Miss Garden had been telling the interviewer how she would 'run Chicago Opera,' and it was suggested that some artists would work against her, whereupon she says:

'A FIGHTER

"I am a fighter. I am an Anglo-Saxon, and we love, by gosh, nothing better than a fight. And count me as a fighter, I am right there in the fray; but the Latin races must be treated with kindness and consideration, and I would pat their cheeks."

Tut! This would never do for a musical journal in effete old England. It would be either deleted or paraphrased. We should be given something like this:

'I suggested to Miss Garden that her policy might conceivably meet with some opposition from the artists, especially those of French or Italian extraction.'

'Possibly,' she replied; 'but I have, I think, a fair share of that combativeness with which we Anglo-Saxons are so liberally endowed. Nevertheless, though not wanting in firmness, I should not be unmindful of the fact that the Latin temperament needs tactful management, and I trust I should remember the importance of softening the iron hand by wearing the velvet glove. This of course is a figure of speech.'

Here is another passage that would have called for the blue pencil:

"New York critics are all dried up old men," she hurriedly to answer. "They have no 'modern sap' in their veins, and the only man for whom I'd give a d— is Huneke. The balance bore me to death."

The interview ends—as it began—with a handsome tribute to the singer:

‘Thus the writer took leave of a most charming woman in the artistic world, to-day an angel, to-morrow a tigress, but on Friday, March 12, an adorable, simple, and true American girl.’

A full-length portrait shows us this simple girl clad in a sheath-like sequin gown with a long train, a bracelet large and simple (but probably made of some quite expensive material), and with her only visible hand covered with plain rings, each containing an austere simple precious stone of the size of a hazel-nut.

The old-fashioned folk who thought Tetrzzini was sufficiently boomed when in England don't know what booming is. Madame was much better looked after in America. In the Courier of March 25 she fills over a page (equal to about three pages of the Musical Times) headed:

‘LUIA TETRAZZINI CALLS PROHIBITION

and helped out by a trifle of seven illustrations. I wish space allowed me to quote liberally from the interview. As it does not, I must be content with noting that her Press agent advised the journalist to talk about ‘movies’ or prohibition—anything but art, as Madame hated talking about herself; that she was ‘simply gowned’ (how simple the really great are!); that at one stage of the proceedings she ‘nodded her copper-coloured head’; that she soon managed to overcome her repugnance to talk of herself; and that she ended the ordeal with: ‘Next season I will come back to my dear United States and all my nice friends. Ah!’ she sighed happily, with a gentle shrug of her shoulders, ‘It makes me happy just to say those words!’ (When Madame next pays us a visit we shall hear ‘those words’ again, with ‘England’ substituted for ‘United States.’)

The illustrations show us Madame on board the Mauretania; with her manager and accompanist; with her dog ‘Joy’; starting off on an aeroplane trip; trying a hydroplane in Seattle, Washington; and in a Los Angeles studio after being filmed. The seventh picture is of a bear christened by Madame at Denver, Colorado. Even then the pictorial possibilities have not been exhausted, for in another part of the same journal we find an illustration almost as large as a page of the Musical Times, showing the diva—singing? Studying a new song? Playing the pianoforte? Nothing so ordinary! She is photographed paying her income-tax. She holds one end of a batch of notes, as if loth to part (you know the feeling); the collector holds the other end, the ‘Chief Tax Expert’ looks on, and a huge profile, presumably that of her Press agent, edges itself in at the top left-hand corner of the picture. On all four faces is a wide and satisfying smile. Below appears:

‘PAYS INCOME TAX IN $1,000 BILLS’

‘One of the last to pay her income-tax, Luisa Tetrzzini, the world-famous singer, created a sensation in the New York Customs House when she paid her tax in crisp bills of $1,000 denomination. The above photograph shows Madame Tetrzzini handing to Collector “Big Bill” Edwards the $1,000 bills, while Chief Tax Expert S. B. Thomas looks on.’

There is no accounting for taste. I have frequently been a bit late paying my income-tax; I have even been ‘one of the last.’ In fact on one or two occasions—but let the dead past bury its dead. The point is that when the much overdue transaction has at last been managed, there was the minimum of publicity, and nobody smiled, least of all ‘Feste.’

This income-tax business is evidently a favourite stunt with great simple-souled artists across the water. In another journal I find a picture of Caruso handing over a few thousand of the best. Again ‘Big Bill’ Edwards shares the lime-light; again both parties tightly hold on to the ends of the ‘check,’ and Big Bill is still smiling, though Caruso’s amusement is a good deal less pronounced, as is perhaps natural. It appears, too, that artists who are not sufficiently simple to be photographed yet manage to obtain some publicity when they go a-taxpaying. They put it off till the entries close, so to speak, and then form a queue at Big Bill’s door. Thus a paragraph on the subject tells a palpitating public that ‘Noticed in line on the final day were Galli-Curci, Tetrzzini, and a host of other notables.’

Clearly Mr. Quinlan’s warning must be heeded if our native artists are to be able to hold their own when their American rivals come on the scene.

But there will be no publicity worth mentioning until our musical journals show themselves ready to generate some of the ‘driving force’ of which I have given a few samples. At present if one of our prime donne wanted a copy of the Musical Times containing a set of pictures showing her (1.) Boarding a Bus at the Bank; (2.) Currycombing her Chow ‘Siegfried’; (3.) Shopping at Terry & Doms; (4.) Registering her Vote at Balls Pond Bye-Election; (5.) Paying her Water-Rate; and (6.) Foozling her Niblick at Sandy Lodge—could she get such a copy? Nope! Very well then; I guess that right here is where we gotta get a move on.

We take this opportunity of reminding our readers of the Congress of the British Music Society, which takes place in London on May 3, 4, 5, and 6. Never was it more important for musicians to ‘get together’ than at the present time, and we hope that members and friends will back up the energetic executive of the Society by filling the halls not only at the attractive concerts, but at the even more important meetings.

Almost as popular as the short G minor, and a far more significant piece of music, is the Prelude and Fugue in E minor (ii., 44), known as 'the little E minor,' to distinguish it from its mighty companion in the same key, 'the Wedge.' It evidently dates from this period, for there are traces of Northern influence in both movements, and no sign that Bach had yet been affected by his growing acquaintance with the Italian string composers. The opening of the Prelude, all the florid passages, and especially the double shakes and the pedal solo, are as Buxtehudian as can be. There is, however, far more feeling present than is usually the case in material of the kind. The emotional climax of the Prelude is reached in the passage in which a little four-note motive appears in an inner part, accompanied by detached chords. It is perhaps one of the earliest examples of a liberal use of the dominant minor ninth as an emotional factor. Bach gives us seven bars of it—or are there only six? For bar 18 in the edition before us is not universally accepted. Griepenkerl says it was 'formerly wanting,' and inserted it in his edition on the authority of manuscript copies belonging to Forkel and Kittel. Here is the passage, the doubtful bar being enclosed in dotted lines:

As is so often the case in matters of textual accuracy, the difference is not very important from a playing point of view. Probably not one listener in a hundred would feel able to say which of the two versions was preferable. The interest lies rather in the little glimmer of light it sheds on the methods of the composer—and perhaps on those of his editors. When an interpolation is by way of making a passage smooth and conventional, as happens here, we are on the whole inclined to look at it with suspicion. We know Bach's fondness for the unexpected, even in his youth, and we know that the Kittels and Forkels invariably liked the other thing. It is easy to imagine them shaking their learned heads over this passage, pointing out that the E in the bass ought not to rise an augmented fourth. Knowing that one of the tribe inserted a bar of 6-4 harmony after bar 22 of the First Prelude of the '48,' in order to avoid Bach's consecutive diminished sevenths, we naturally credit them with any passage that looks like a conscientious teacher's correction of a clever pupil's exercise. It was their way of making the world safe for pedagogy. The doubtful bar is not only conventional; it is weak in that it moves to a half-close already reached more effectively in the preceding bar, and so gives us consecutive bars with the same harmony on the first beat. Although, as was said above, very few listeners would be conscious of the stagnation thus caused, I believe that most players who give both versions a good trial will end with a strong preference for with its bold transference of the seventh.

The Prelude is often spoilt by too quick a pace. Playing it with plenty of diapasons in a big building, we may even regard the quaver as the unit. Moreover only a slow pace can give the pedal passages the right ponderous effect—especially the final one, with its naive increase of emphasis by extension of the thirds into tenths.

The repeated cadence is curious, and should be emphasised. If we are giving the Prelude loud treatment, we should reserve something for the final bar; if soft, there should still be a stop to put in.

The melancholy of the Prelude is more than maintained in the Fugue. Indeed, the chief significance of the work lies in the fact of its being the first expression—at all events so far as organ music is concerned—of the deep feeling which was to find such noble utterance later, especially in the great B minor Prelude and Fugue, and the D minor (Doric) Fugue. It has another link with so much of the ripest of Bach's music in that it is capable of several widely different methods of performance. Hearing it played with delicate and expressive registration, we feel that just so, and in no other way, should it be allowed to deliver its message—until we hear it invested with all the pomp of a huge organ. We then see that it has more than one mood. The two pairs of repeated notes with which it opens are no longer a timid question, but a ringing challenge. We do not exaggerate when we say that it ceases to be a lyric, and becomes a miniature epic.

A third interpretation is no less effective if our organ allows us to carry it out. We may begin very softly, and gradually work up to a triumphant conclusion. In this case the major ending given in some editions will be in the picture. Otherwise we shall do well to close with a minor chord.

Like the 'short' G minor fugue, this striking work contains a few technical blemishes. The second pedal entry does nothing more than provide harmonic support—a weakness which we shall meet with hardly again—and the writing at this point suddenly changes from two-part counterpoint to five-part harmony, the subject walking between a series of dominant and tonic chords, interspersed with rests. The subject itself is much more striking than such a simple—even bald—progression ought to be. Look at it:

Short as it is, one half is mere repetition. It is a double-barrelled germ rather than a subject. Pirro suggests that the repeated two-note opening on the dominant is due to Buxtehude's in the well-known fugue in F, 'but there the repetition has all the effect of a joyous affirmation.'*

The pace of the fugue, like that of the prelude, should be decidedly slow. It may be well to add that the mordente of the subject should be diatonic, i.e., B, A natural, B, in accordance with Bach's own practice.† Spitta is rightly emphatic as to the weakening effect of the semitone.

The interest of these early works depends very little on mere bulk, as the reader will already have seen. Thus the next essay to be considered calls for brief notice, despite the fact of its being more than double the length of that just dealt with. It is a Prelude and Fugue in G major (vii., 80), and shows us Bach beginning to cater for himself as an organ virtuoso.

The prelude is brilliant, but unfortunately has little merit otherwise. After the strangely attractive 'little' E minor work it strikes one as being very superficial, with thematic material of no originality, and an entire absence of feeling. There is, however, a marked advance in technique. Thus, the writing for the pedals throughout both movements shows a great advance on anything we have so far met with. (The Weimar organ had a fine pedal department, including a 32-ft. and a 4-ft. reed, and we may imagine young Bach revelling in it.) It is interesting to see Bach for the first time showing himself fully appreciative of the upper part of the pedal board. The pedal solo is a fair specimen of a bad type, calculated to show off both organist and organ-builder, but without a spark of musical interest. Spitta says in its favour that 'it is legitimately built upon the fundamental theme.' This is true, but as the fundamental theme itself happens to be one of the commonplaces of music the solo can hardly fail to follow suit. These gambols over, the movement improves considerably, though still remaining poor. A Grave of three bars leads to a fugue very much like the prelude in style. The subject is decidedly Buxtehudian:

Bach sticks closely to his text, and gives us a fugue at which no stones can be thrown on technical grounds. The pedal part is first-rate. Its entries are preceded by lengthy rests, and it sails in with the subject in telling style. When it has finished with the theme, and the conversation becomes general, it lends a hand with pithy ejaculations. Again we see the upper reaches of the board well used. We may reckon that in this fugue Bach found himself so far as this important part of organ composition is concerned. In the matter of consistency, too, the fugue is entirely successful. The quaver movement is unbroken, and, despite its length, the movement neither sticks nor gets loose. These merits, however, cannot save a work in which the actual musical interest is slight. A glance at the subject will show that a lengthy movement developed from it is likely to be spoilt by a kind of chattering volubility. Bach has not escaped this danger, and so the fugue makes little appeal to-day, despite its animation and the really splendid vigour of its close. Even Spitta (who uses the adjectives 'rich,' 'beautiful,' and 'splendid,' in connection with the prelude!) admits that the fugue is too long, and that its animation is of a 'more purely external kind.'

A few words should be said here as to the Eight Short Preludes and Fugues (i.).

They are sometimes regarded as very early works, but there can be no doubt about their having been written after Bach had been settled at Weimar for a considerable time—long enough to have gathered round him a few pupils. We may well understand that good teaching material—brief, employing two manuals, and with a definite and moderately difficult pedal-part—must have been scarce at that date. Bach's endeavour to supply the deficiency was so successful that the collection—at all events the fugal part—has taken a high place in the curriculum, and is hardly likely to be superseded. The general level of excellence in the writing proves them to belong to a period when the composer was approaching maturity. Only once—at the end of No. 6—do we find a weak use of the pedal; the subjects are tuneful and good, the episodes generally natural and interesting, and the counterpoint usually quite first-rate. Even their simplicity and brevity indicate a fairly late date, for, as Spitta shrewdly points out, youthful genius is not usually inclined to be simple and unpretentious, and Bach was no exception to the rule. A further hint as to the date of these works is to be found in the preludes, which remind us that Bach was much attracted in his early Weimar days with the Concertos of Vivaldi. The movements in which this influence is most apparent are the first (especially in bars 5-8) fifth, seventh, and eighth. The result is not happy, the preludes being a long way below the fugues in interest. Only one is really worth playing to-day,—that in E minor, a thoughtful little piece with the real Bach spirit, especially in its gravely expressive close:

Ex. 6.

The remaining preludes being so inferior, it is a matter for regret that so many pupils are made to waste time over them. Such technical material as they contain can easily be provided by the shorter and easier of the choral preludes. Many of these are for manuals alone, and so provide valuable studies in three- and four-part playing, besides being so delightful as pure music that a player finds pleasure in them long after his pupil days are over, whereas he gives the Eight Preludes a wide berth save when teaching. When these articles come to deal with the choral preludes, I shall endeavour to provide a graded list of those suitable for the use of elementary and fairly advanced players.

SEDLEY TAYLOR

BY EDWARD J. DENT

On any fine afternoon during the last five and twenty years before the war one might easily chance to meet out for a walk on the outskirts of Cambridge a couple of old friends oddly contrasting in appearance—the one of moderate height, and immaculate with white mutton-chop whiskers, frock coat, and silk hat of rather old-fashioned shape, the other shorter in stature, with hair rather long and curling behind, a full beard just beginning to turn grey, wearing a soft brown hat and clothes of antique cut, generally brandishing an umbrella in one hand and a red silk handkerchief in the other, as he talked excitedly and energetically to his impassive and stately companion. The two were Aldis Wright, who died a few years ago, and Sedley Taylor, whose death took place on March 14.

Sedley Taylor had spent practically all his life in Trinity. He was born at Norwich and educated partly in Germany; he spoke German with remarkable fluency and had many friends in that country. Except for a few years when he was in holy orders, he hardly ever left the sheltered life of Cambridge. He very soon gave up his clerical profession in the stress of religious doubt which agitated the 'sixties of the last century, but he never gave up his acute interest in theological controversy; it was second only to the ruling passion of his life—music. In middle life he devoted himself largely to the study of acoustics, and his book 'Sound and Music' had considerable importance in its day as introducing the theories of Helmholtz to English readers. He was also a keen enthusiast for Tonic Sol-fa, having been in youth a close friend of Miss Glover. But at Cambridge he will be remembered not so much for his literary productions as for his singular and singularly lovable personality. He had belonged to that small band of musical enthusiasts whom Sterndale Bennett in the early years of his professorship inspired with devotion to Bach. It was to him in his undergraduate days that a kindly old Vice-Provost of King's, on hearing that he was a lover of music, had made the classic observation, 'Music, Sir, is a very agreeable diversion for a man who cannot afford to hunt.' The last twenty or thirty years saw a great change in the attitude of this country, and so of Cambridge too, towards music, a change to which Sedley Taylor's power of making friends with younger men and inspiring them with his enthusiasm contributed its share. He was never happier than when expounding Bach at the pianoforte to a circle of undergraduates. He understood Bach in all his moods, and his performance of the comic bass air from the 'Coffee Cantata' was a thing never to be forgotten. His endless fund of amusing stories, accompanied by the oddest gestures of appreciation, delighted all, musical or unmusical, who knew him. But behind the raconteur and the Bach enthusiast there stood another character, scrupulous almost to agony on the smallest question of right and wrong, endlessly and quietly generous of his private means to those who stood in need of help. He received the freedom of the Borough of Cambridge for his liberality in founding a dental clinic for school children. The shock of the war, and still more the death of his old friend Aldis Wright, clouded his last years with a painful nervous trouble, but although he did not long survive the changed conditions, his friends were at least happy to note that with the restoration of Cambridge, and especially the University Musical Club to normal life, he reverted, if only for a short time, to something like his former cheerfulness and gaiety of spirit.

A FRENCH VIEW OF BRAHMS

Nice problem for a greatly gifted young composer: What to do when all your friends insist that you are another Beethoven and oughtn't to stoop beneath Heroic and Choral symphonies, whereas your own inner impulse is to dally with tender and melancholy little things?

There are two answers, (1.) Do your best to live up to your friends' ideas of you, and even a generation after your death there may still be, with luck (especially in Great Britain and Ireland) people taking you at that valuation; (2.) Do what instinct prompts and no more, and it will be better for you that day when some analytical, dispassionate Frenchman like M. Landormy turns piercing eyes to your work. If incense-burning is once started to your honour in Britain, the thurifers will carry on for ages—so be happy. But in France apotheosis is followed almost at once by autopsy, so beware.

There is a good deal to be said for the manners of the new Athens. It is pleasant to hear a quiet and disenchanted voice in the 'Ἀκαδημία, a voice that would be horrified to vie in pitch with the zealots and thurifers. The English books on Brahms are like a sort of little theological pamphlet, too gushing and dogmatic to be readable outside a particular sect. The author of this book*—which is one of an excellent series just resumed after a lapse of six years—is French, and knows that he must persuade, not preach. He will do his best for his subject, but it is no good (he well sees) offering Brahms whole, like the roast ox of a medieval Christmas. He has to tempt delicate appetites, and though it be butchery he must cut down to the essential Brahms and offer no more. The operator decides that the Symphonies, the 'Requiem,' and the Pianoforte Quintet can be cut clean away.

In Brahms our author sees a romantic who didn't know it or was fighting against his nature—not a romantic in the grand manner of Berlioz or Wagner, but a more middle-class sort, who was content with a little dreaming by moonlight and pessimism without paroxysms:

'There is no salient character in Brahms's music, nothing that at once arouses attention, nor anything amusing or seductive by its sensual appeal. In his best moments Brahms remains pale, effaced; he delights in neutral hues, "Autumn gold in melancholy parks, and the sad greys of winter walks." But that precisely is what may be found lovable in him, and therein certainly lies his most assured originality. The pity is that Brahms too rarely wrote as Brahms. Hence the result that so often he is only honest and dull.'

M. Landormy finds the real Brahms in the first two Violin Sonatas (in the third, Brahms 'talks a language which is not his own, he falls into grandiloquence and emptiness'); then in the B major Trio (far superior in the youthful version), and the D minor Pianoforte Concerto. This last 'may fatigue by its monotony, but has a beauty that should not be ignored.' It is far preferable to the 'merely estimable' Violin Concerto. He has a few kind words for the three String Quartets, and esteems the second String Quintet much above the first, the second above the first Sextet. He cherishes some of the songs, 'Love Everlasting,' and the 'Alto Rhapsody,' and among pianoforte pieces Op. 118, 'of which every page is worth quoting.' He also praises the Double Concerto.

But Brahms's friends (he opines) shouldn't have urged him to write symphonies, encouraging him in believing he had the variety and richness of passion in him to sustain inspiration comparable with Beethoven's. By thus doing

'Brahms forsakes the narrow domain where he is truly original. He has really nothing of the hero or of the martyr in him. His soul is no whit in torment. Sublimity fails him. The sentiments he would express in his symphonies he feels but shallowly; he may understand them by sympathy but they are not natural or familiar to him. If the symphonies of Brahms—the least interesting part of his work—do contain certain pages worth attention it is because the author manages for an instant to escape the obligations prescribed when he conceived the gigantic design of writing Beethovenian symphonies—an inordinate ambition imposed on him by his circle.'

Thus M. Landormy describes the C minor:

'A first movement which struggles in vain to be pathetic. An Andante which draws on all the resources of hollow rhetoric. A Finale with a principal theme proclaiming with such effrontery its relationship with that of the "Ode to Joy" that one ends by feeling quite uncomfortable and somehow ashamed. One movement is worthy of Brahms—the Allegretto.'

* 'Brahms.' Par Paul Landormy. (Paris, Alcan, 1920.) 'Les Maîtres de la Musique' series.)

He prefers the D major because here Brahms 'has not tried to swell his voice beyond its strength.' The F major would fain be high-spirited, generous, exuberant, and this impulse carries it through the first fifteen bars. What after analysis remains of the E minor in sincere and original emotion as apart from cleverness in counterpoint and development?

'One phrase, one single phrase, the phrase which opens the first movement—disenchanted, sad without violence, all in neutral tints, a Novemberish effect. Why did Brahms think himself bound to leave the realm of chamber music where he was so perfectly suited, to enter that of the symphony? He thereby did himself great harm. The majority of the public, going only to orchestral concerts, knows Brahms only by the most negligible part of his work.'

M. Landormy places the 'Requiem' among Brahms's less characteristic productions:

'The success of this cantata is easily explained, like that of Mendelssohn's oratorios. It is the severe and archaic art of Handel and Bach brought to the reach of the big public by a clever modernisation which leaves the illusion of an antique style. It is Bach and Handel popularised.'

Brahms makes here an unnatural effort to speak a dead language, and 'you will seek in the "Requiem" in vain for one of those progressions, one of those melodic or rhythmical formulæ which are Brahms's property, as it were, his author's mark, which make the originality of his best compositions and date them.'

The best story in all the mass of Brahms literature is that of the cook in the house of a Roman friend. By way of a joke she was told that Brahms was contemplating an offer of marriage; on which she proudly answered, 'Sono Romana, nata al Ponte Rotto, dove sta il tempio da Vesta, non sposerò mai un barbaro!' ('I am a woman of Rome, born at the Ponte Rotto, yonder by Vesta's temple, and never will I marry a barbarian'). Similarly the French mind cannot bring itself to be wholly won by the German's art, and Brahms's very apologist is found disconcerted by the quality of his emotion:

'In his expression of feeling we descry now too much relaxation, and again too much restraint. If Brahms sometimes seems given to a loose sentimentality, there is also the North German in him which repulses us. We find him in places dry and cold, with a needless austerity too obviously put on, then elsewhere he annoys by his blubbery tone and the show of his heart on his sleeve.'

M. Landormy finds a counterpart of the emotional content of Brahms's music in the nature of certain of his little affairs of the heart—with Clara and Julia Schumann and Agatha von Siebold. There was here a certain spilling of sentimental affection. To Clara he wrote in the tone (judged by English notions) of the pledged lover. There was not a pennyworth of passion in it.

'Despite,' says M. Landormy, 'the apparent definiteness of his declarations, I am not convinced that Brahms loved Clara Schumann with actual love, though no doubt she inspired the deepest affection of his life.' Their exact relations remain a mystery, (p. 19), but one is inclined to believe them platonic by the very nature of Brahms's music if with M. Landormy one sees the essence of it a mild melancholy and sadly tender little meditations about nothing in particular, the effusions of a man for whom no such thing as passion existed. This French apologist's claims may in England be thought to be pitched low, but for what he does claim he makes a firm stand:

'The sonata is no longer with Brahms a drama, but becomes a mirroring of motives which echo each to each, are superimposed, reflect each other, then grow dim, fade away and vanish like the forms of an inconsistent reverie, harmonious in its very indecision and impeccably logical in its apparent liberty. Therein lies what is most precious in his work.'

And the first two Violin Sonatas he has previously praised as 'intimate, tender, confidential music, without brilliance or strength but of a delicious freshness. This Brahms is simple, natural, quite original. In all his instrumental music nothing equals these two Sonatas; they are incomparable masterpieces.'

In England we are more used to Glorias and Magnificats from our Brahmsians, stridently uttered ex cathedra. It is at least curious to observe how much lower is the pitch in France—salutary, perhaps, when such an authority as Dr. Ernest Walker can amazingly declare Brahms to be (with Beethoven and Bach) one of the three 'chief landmarks' in two centuries of music.

NEW LIGHT ON EARLY TUDOR COMPOSERS

BY W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD

VIII.—SIMON BURTON

Considerable confusion has been caused, owing to the fact that two composers of the name of Burton flourished almost contemporaneously, with the result that most of our musical historians have regarded them as the one person and have so treated them, crediting all the musical activities of the two to a single individual, Davy Burton or Avery Burton, whose career has been set forth in my first article ('David Burton').* Yet it is certain that there were two musicians named Burton who flourished under Henry VIII., but while one was known as Davy or Avery, the other was called Simon. Moreover, David Burton was the earlier of the two, and reference is made to him under Henry VII., in 1494, whereas Simon Burton does not come into prominence till 1530 or 1531. It is not at all unlikely that David Burton was styled 'Davy,' or 'Avery,' in order to distinguish him from Simon Burton, especially as both were attached to the Court.

Simon Burton was in some way attached to the Household of Henry VIII. in 1530, because in or about that year he enjoyed a corrody in the monastery of St. Augustine's, Bristol. This corrody he surrendered in January, 1533, and on February 4 it was given to William Ap Howell, one of the Marshals of the King's Hall.

In 1534 he entered the service of the Princess Mary, and taught her the Virginals*—an instrument on which she was already fairly proficient. From a letter written by the Bishop of Tarbes, one of the French Ambassadors, in the autumn of the year 1535, we learn that the Princess 'amused herself while the Ambassadors were with Elizabeth, by playing on the Virginals.'

After the death of Queen Katharine on January 8, 1536, and the execution of Anne Boleyn in May, the Princess Mary was allowed an establishment of her own, consisting of forty-two persons, and on August 30 was proclaimed heiress apparent to the English throne. The death of Jane Seymour, on October 24, 1537, naturally improved the position of Mary, and we are given many notices of Simon Burton during 1536-45 in the Privy Purse Expenses of the Princess Mary, edited by Sir Frederick Madden in 1831.

On December 10, 1536, Simon Burton received a douceur of twenty shillings from the Princess—followed at Christmas by a similar amount (almost equal to £20 of our present money), and we find that his actual salary was £4 a year, paid quarterly. In March, June, and September of 1537, Burton's payments are duly recorded, and in September, 1537, he received a bonus of 11s. 3d., while the regular quarterly payments of 20s. are entered for the years 1538 and 1539, with several extra 'tips.'

An interesting entry under date July, 1538, reveals the fact that Simon Burton was a married man, as we read that Princess Mary gave five shillings to Burton himself and a similar sum to 'Symon Burton's wife.' The Princess must have derived considerable benefit from Burton's teaching, because in a letter from the Ambassador Chapuys to the Queen of Hungary in 1538 he describes 'her admirable playing on the lute and virginals.'

Burton received his accustomed salary quarterly during the years 1539-43, and in November of the latter year received twenty shillings 'payment in advance.' In January, 1544, he received a like sum 'for his New Year's gift,' and the diplomatic musician sent a present of 'Capons and pudding' to the Princess. In October, 1544, the Princess gave Charley Morley 13s. 4d. 'for Symon Burton,' and 6s. 8d. to Lady Kempe for him. He was also paid the usual Christmas quarterly present of 20s. in December, 1544.

The last reference I have met with concerning Simon Burton is on December 25, 1545, in the King's Book of Payments, from which it appears he had a quarterly salary of 50s. as 'player on the Virginals.' He probably died soon after, and his name does not appear in King Edward VI.'s establishment nor in that of Queen Mary.

Occasional Notes

We are glad to hear that our 'Chamber Music for Amateurs' column has already brought a good many performers together, and we note with satisfaction that readers in the provinces are beginning to realise that the column is not for the benefit of London players alone. At the same time we take this opportunity of pointing out that the correspondent who wishes us to insert an announcement of his anxiety 'to correspond with a young lady, aged 18-20, a good pianist' is rather too liberal in his interpretation of our scheme. It is not a matrimonial agency. We are kept so busy attending to Apollo that we have no time to open a department for Cupid.

Many of us have speculated as to the hidden theme of the 'Enigma' Variations. Mr. Krehbiel, a New York critic, has speculated so actively that he claims to have solved the mystery. The hidden tune, he tells us, is the 'Pure Fool' motive from 'Parsifal.' We have referred the matter to Sir Edward Elgar, who authorises us to state that there is nothing in Mr. Krehbiel's theory.

'Music should be played in the fields, to inflame the workers to work harder.'—Pravda (Bolshevist paper):

When music—heavenly maid—was young,
Her power as balm was early noted.
(Congreve her soothing charms has sung—
The lines are usually misquoted.)
But soothing charms are out of date;
The ancient usage we improve on;
She's called on now to stimulate,
And help the worker get a move on.
But that's in Russia. Here the maid
Would very quickly be to rout put:
How dare she try to meddle with
Our practice of restricted output?
The Muscovite, perchance, might go it
When fired by trumpet or tympani;
When we're 'inflamed' we merely show it
By 'downing tools' and 'ca'ing canny.'

We are unfortunately obliged to hold over this month's instalment of M. Saint-Saëns's 'Ideas of Vincent d'Indy.'

We regret that the sketch of Mr. Hamilton Harty on page 228 of our April issue was inadvertently stated to be 'by a Hallé Bandsman,' whereas it should have been ascribed to Mr. James Dodgson ('Kester'), the caricaturist who enlivens the pages of the Yorkshire Evening Post and Yorkshire Weekly Post.

London Concerts

BY ALFRED KALISCH

By far the most important new orchestral work produced in London since my last article appeared, has been Mr. Gustav Holst's 'Hymn of Jesus,' which was heard at the Philharmonic Concert on March 25, and is a setting of an ancient Gnostic hymn from the Apocryphal Acts of St. John, elaborately laid out for two choruses, semi-chorus, orchestra, pianoforte, and organ.

It is a very remarkable work, the full importance of which it is difficult to estimate on first acquaintance,

* I suspect that Simon 'Burton' and not 'Paston' was the Princess's music master. Paston is probably a scribal error.

the more so as the composer has sedulously striven to invent a new idiom, in which primitive simplicity and modern complexity shall go hand in hand. At one hearing, it can only be said that the whole result is impressive, and that it shows as clearly as does any other work by the same composer his easy mastery in handling large masses of sound. In some places he resorts to realism, as in the beginning, 'Divine Grace is dancing,' and in the section where we have a picturesque representation—the general outlook of which may be considered as analogous to that of Holbein or Dürer—of the conflict of the human soul with evil. It is a daring but convincing interpretation of the spiritual meaning of the hymn 'Vexilla Regis prodeunt.'

It would be interesting to compare the former in detail with the similar section of the dance of the Superman in Strauss's 'Zarathustra.'

The Amens, intoned by the semi-chorus in the organ-loft, which punctuate the end of each section—slightly varied each time—play an important part in producing the total other-worldly effect. In the climaxes the composer reaches a high level of massive power.

The new Philharmonic Choir sang very well, and its performance of Bach's Cantata, 'God goeth up with shouting,' was also very creditable. This was one of the test-pieces at the last National Eisteddfod, and one could not help wondering whether the Choir would have obtained one of the three prizes on that occasion. Probably not. None the less it is as good as any other London organization. The Choir also sang Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah' with a good deal of full-blooded energy. The soloists were not up to Philharmonic standards.

An interesting feature of the concert was the performance of an Organ Concerto of Handel by Mr. H. Goss Custard, with fine cadenzas by W. T. Best. It is interesting to note that this concert took place a few days before the appearance of the April issue of the Chesterian, in which the inclusion of organ solos in our concert programmes was strenuously advocated. This concert was conducted by Mr. Kennedy Scott.

Another important orchestral event was the playing at the Queen's Hall Symphony Concert on March 20 of Sibelius's fourth Symphony, which was originally produced at the last Birmingham Festival before the war, and had not been heard since. It was not received with any favour then, and it hardly proved more acceptable on this occasion, in spite of the care obviously lavished upon it by Sir Henry Wood. The admirers of Sibelius are much impressed by what they call his 'terseness,' that is to say, his avoidance of all superfluous steps in his musical argument. It is a doctrine that looks very well on paper; but in this case, when translated into practice, it seems to mean the omission of everything agreeable and pleasant, which makes one doubt its value as a theory even in the eyes of those who are least disposed to owe allegiance to established rules of construction. How it would work out in a composition in which the themes in themselves were powerful or beautiful it is hard to say—in this instance they are neither. And the whole work seems to express a sullen and generally unpleasant view of life in general.

We were interested in the analytical programme that the Scherzo is merry and buoyant, which causes one to wonder what sort of music Sibelius would write if he were depicting melancholy discontent.

At the Queen's Hall Symphony Concert on April 17 Sir Henry Wood introduced two new French compositions—a pleasing Suite by Roger-Ducasse and a Symphony by Ernest Chausson. I can only speak by hearsay of the good impression created by these, as my presence was required elsewhere at the time.

CONGESTION

It is worth putting on record how many musical events were crowded into that afternoon. An instructive moral may be drawn from the list. Besides the Queen's Hall concert in question there was the production at the Surrey Theatre of Mr. Nicholas Gatty's Opera, 'The Tempest,' the second concert of the Bach Festival at Central Hall, Westminster, M. Rosing's recital at Æolian Hall, Miss Adela Verne's pianoforte recital at Wigmore Hall, and Miss Sterling Mackinlay's afternoon song recital at Steinway Hall. It is difficult to know who benefits by such congestion, and still more difficult to say how it can be avoided.

Mention should be made of Mr. Hamilton Harty's new Orchestral Suite based on Oriental stories which he conducted at Miss Murray Lambert's concert at Queen's Hall on March 23. It is notable for the variety of colour the composer has been able to obtain with the use of limited means. The Suite deserves mention for an extraneous reason, which is not without significance as a sign of the times. I believe this is the first occasion in the history of music that an orchestral piece has been recorded on the gramophone before its first public performance.

At this concert Miss Murray Lambert proved herself, by her performance of Max Bruch's Scottish Fantasia, to be a violinist worthy of attention.

Other violinists who have justified their claims in the last few weeks are M. Dornay, M. Dushkin (who confirmed the good impression made at his orchestral concert), and M. Bratzr Yovanovitch, a Serbian boy of undoubted promise.

There have been some interesting chamber concerts, among which prominence must be given to the Elgar concert of the London Chamber Concert Society, which proved once more how firm a hold the chamber works of Sir Edward Elgar have obtained on the affections of the public. A pathetic interest attaches to this concert, as it was probably the last that was attended by the late Lady Elgar.

At another concert of the same Society Miss Fanny Davies introduced some new compositions for the pianoforte by the Bohemian composer Joseph Suk. One was a brilliant Fantasia, 'La Joie de Vivre,' and the remainder comprised a Suite of pieces written by the composer, after the death of his wife, for his little boy. They are very charming numbers of intimate sentiment in the national idiom, which is, however, not insisted on too heavily, and they show keen appreciation of the possibilities of the pianoforte.

At her violoncello recital, Miss Adelina Leon showed that she has made very marked progress towards artistic maturity. Several vocal recitals were also especially interesting. The fresh voice and musical intelligence of Miss Ursula Greville were most welcome, and she combined interpretative power and skill in florid singing to an unusual degree. Madame Calvé's recital at Queen's Hall on March 31 was thoroughly enjoyable, but gives rise to no fresh critical comment.

The sonata recital given by Miss Isolde Menges and Mr. Hamilton Harty on April 10 was completely artistic. Their performance of the Medtner Sonata was of outstanding interest. It is a work of considerable individuality and is very effectively written, its principal drawback however being that the composer seems to find it difficult to leave off. Thus each movement has perorations, with the result that the feeling of anti-climax is not always avoided.

An important event of the month was an Elgar concert at Queen's Hall, with Mr. Landon Ronald and the Albert Hall Orchestra giving fine performances of 'Polonia,' the second Symphony, and the 'Enigma' Variations. Mr. Gervase Elwes sang extracts from 'Gerontius' and two songs with orchestra, one of them—'The River'—being encored. The audience was not so large as it ought to have been, but it was obviously impressed and enthusiastic.

The Musician's Bookshelf

By 'FESTE'

Despite the shortage of paper and the various difficulties of which we hear so much, the stream of books on musical subjects grows so rapidly that a monthly reviewer must either pass lightly over most of them or get hopelessly in arrear. As the usefulness of a column of this kind depends a good deal on its being up-to-date I must be content, in most cases, with putting readers on the track of new books.

Here to begin with is a volume over which I should like to pause—'The Bethlehem Bach Choir,' by Raymond Walters (Houghton Mifflin Co., Boston & New York, 12s. 6d.). I opened it under the impression that it would be of little interest to English readers. We all know about the Choir and the splendid work it has done, but a stout volume concerning its founding and subsequent history seemed to be a kind of domestic affair with which we have no concern. I cannot imagine the life-story of one of our choral societies making an appeal to American musicians. But one never knows, and I soon found myself reading Mr. Walters's book from cover to cover. There is something curiously arresting in the record of the musical activities of this little American town, from its earliest records of nearly a couple of centuries ago down to the appearance of its Bach Choir at a New York Philharmonic concert as recently as 1918. From the first it has been a wonderful example of what can be done by the community of even a small town when well led.

It is a pity that modern conditions have destroyed much of the old simplicity. With a millionaire—Mr. Charles M. Schwab—as backer, with trips to New York, and with imported soloists and orchestra, must come an atmosphere in which the Moravian settlers of a century ago would breathe with difficulty. Hence in reading the book, one passes with regret from the idyllic opening chapters, with their quaint extracts from old diaries, to the later ones, in which there are liberal—perhaps too liberal—press cuttings and a general handing round of bouquets. One finds oneself wondering if all this widespread fame has not been bought at the cost of some of the Choir's power as a social and spiritual factor; the more fierce the limelight so much the less native bloom. I add that there are some first-rate illustrations, including portraits of the conductor, Dr. J. Fred Wollé, and Mr. Schwab.

Students of singing with operatic aims will find much to interest them in Kathleen Howard's 'Confessions of an Opera Singer' (Kegan Paul, 7s. 6d. net), a gossip record of struggle and hard work in various operatic centres on both sides of the Atlantic.

From the same publisher comes 'The Orchestra and How to Listen to It,' by M. Montagu-Nathan. It is one more sign that we are at last beginning to see that listeners no less than performers require to be trained. The average concert-goer misses more than half the pleasure of a fine orchestral concert simply because his ears are deaf to the finer shades of instrumental colour. Let him sit at Mr. Montagu-Nathan's feet, and he will then have ears to hear. The book is written in an attractive manner, and there are three appendices—(1) twenty-three pages of typical passages for the various instruments, (2) the full score of the final chords of nine orchestral works, from Mozart to Scriabin, and (3) illustrations of orchestral instruments.

The Report of the National Conference on the Leisure of the People has now been issued (The Conference Committee, 29, Princess Street, Albert Square, Manchester, 1s. 6d.). The booklet contains about a hundred pages, and is worth careful study by all interested in social and recreative work. Prof. Walford Davies's address on 'Music in the Life of the Nation,' and Miss Daking's account of the activities of the British Folk-Dance Society are the portions that appeal most directly to musicians, but it goes without saying that a conference on the use of leisure contains a good many casual references to the art.

The next three books to be noticed have to do with this aspect of music. 'The Music of Life,' by Charles T. Smith, created such a stir on its appearance last year, and was so widely discussed, that I need do no more than mention that the second edition has now been published (P. S. King & Son, 4s. net).

Another second edition is that of Part 2 of 'The Morris Book,' by Cecil J. Sharp and Herbert C. MacIlwaine (Novello, 2s.). As the original edition appeared ten years ago, when the revival of folk-dancing was in its first stages, Mr. Sharp has revised and entirely re-written the book.

The latest issue (No. 23) of the Journal of the Folk-Song Society (19, Berners Street) is of special interest to all lovers of Irish Folk-Song. It contains thirty-four songs from the valuable collection of Mr. A. M. Freeman, with exhaustive annotations, glossary, &c., and a delightful account by Mr. Freeman of an Irish harvest home concert.

'The Teaching of Music,' by Robert T. White, is one of a series of 'Handbooks in the Art of Teaching,' issued by Messrs. Constable (4s.). Dr. White is well known as an expert in school music, and we have here a book packed with common sense and practical suggestion. The chapters deal with class work from the kindergarten to the advanced grade. I am glad to see that Dr. White suggests that classes should be subdivided with a view to giving extra attention to the handful of children who show more than usual ability. At present it too often happens that the progress of such pupils is regulated by that of the least musical. There will of course be difficulties in adjusting the time-table, but these ought not to be insurmountable.

So much interest is now taken in the music of Spain that a book on the subject is sure of a welcome. Carl van Vechten's 'The Music of Spain' (Kegan Paul, 4s. 6d. net) covers a good deal of ground—somewhat sketchily, perhaps, but the fault is almost inevitable when a big subject has to be treated in a book of 150 pages. Mr. van Vechten writes with an enthusiasm that sometimes prevents him from seeing things in their right proportion. As Mr. Pedro Morales points out in his admirable preface, the idea of the book is better expressed by the heading of the first chapter, 'Spain and Music,' than by the title of the work as a whole. The undue emphasis laid on 'Carmen' is perhaps the worst example of this want of perspective. As a rule the preface to a book may be skimmed through or disregarded, but in the volume before us this is not the case. Mr. Morales gently but firmly puts the author right on so many points that the reader will do well to read the preface very carefully first and consult it from time to time afterwards.

THE BACH FESTIVAL

BY H. C. COLLES

The Festival of J. S. Bach's music given by the Bach Choir at Central Hall, Westminster, on April 16, 17, 19, and 20, afforded the most comprehensive programme that this Society has provided in its career of over forty years. It may be recalled that Sir Charles Stanford conducted three-days' festivals in 1895 and 1897, and Dr. Walford Davies one of two days in 1906, in which the Mass in B minor and other of the greater choral works, notably the 'St. Matthew' Passion in 1897, were outstanding features. But while the recent Festival began with Church cantatas and ended with the Mass it contained between them examples of practically every side of Bach's compositions except his writing for solo violoncello. The solo violin was represented by the Chaconne which Miss May Harrison played at the third concert, the organ by the Prelude and Fugue in C minor and two Choral Preludes, 'Allein Gott' and 'Valet will ich dir geben' (Mr. G. Thalben Ball), the clavichord and the harpsichord (for both of which the pianoforte was however used) for two Preludes and Fugues from the '48,' Book 1, No. 21, in B flat and No. 3 in C sharp minor (Miss Myra Hess), and the Toccata in C minor (Mr. Harold Samuel). There were concertos for various groups of instruments. The well-known example for two violins in D minor (Mr. W. H. Reed and Mr. C. Woodhouse) came between the sacred and secular cantatas of the first programme; the rarely heard Concerto for flute, violin, and pianoforte in A minor (M. Louis Fleury, Miss May Harrison, and Miss Myra Hess); and that for three pianofortes in C major (Miss Myra Hess, Mr. Herbert Fryer, and Mr. Harold Samuel) were important features of the second programme, which was mainly instrumental, and included also two of the orchestral overtures—that in B minor for flute and strings, and that in D (No. 3) with trumpets and drums.

The third programme was chiefly unaccompanied choral work, and included three of the greatest of the Motets—'Come, Jesu, come' (double choir), 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure' (five voices), and 'Sing to the Lord' (double choir). The organ, violin, and Mr. Samuel's pianoforte solos were interspersed with these, and this concert also introduced a number of the solo hymns contributed by Bach to Schemelli's collection (1736), with the song 'Bist du bei mir,' from Anna Magdalena's book, sung by Miss Ethel McLelland.

As to the cantatas, the first programme on Friday night contained two complete Church cantatas, 'To this end Appeared the Son of God' ('Dazu ist erschienen,' No. 40 in the Bachgesellschaft edition), and 'Since Christ is all my being' ('Christus der ist mein Leben,' No. 95), with a large part of the secular cantata, 'The Appeasing of Æolus' ('Der zufriedengestellte Æolus'). There were also single movements from five other Church cantatas, three of which came in the first programme and two in the second. One of these, the chorale, 'Jesu, Joy of man's desiring' ('Herz und Mund und That und Leben,' No. 147), opened the proceedings, and was beautifully sung, the smooth tone of the choir combining well with the wreathed figures of the string accompaniment. 'To this end Appeared' starts with a fine chorus on the severely theological argument of the text. The choir showed remarkable force and energy in its treatment, but the chorales, of which there are three, summing up the points elaborated by the solo numbers, gave them a more sympathetic task subsequently. Miss Sibyl Cropper, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Murray Davey were the soloists, and their performances might be described in the language of the weather reports as 'fair to changeable.' Miss Dorothy Silk, who followed the cantata with the song 'My heart ever faithful' ('Also hat Gott,' No. 68), had to submit to Dr. Allen's view of the song as a rollicking dance measure, and it was all she could do to sing it at the pace he set her. Mr. Paterson Parker, who played the violoncello obbligato, shared her difficulties. But apart from this, Miss Silk was the only one of the solo singers in this concert who did anything to remove the impression that the general level of solo-singing is inadequate for the performance of Bach's greater works. In 'Since Christ is all my being' her singing of the soprano recitative and the chorale ('Valet will ich dir geben') was one of the most exquisite moments in a work surcharged with intimate expression for voices and for instruments. Miss Cropper sang the solo 'Rejoice, ye souls' ('O ewiges Feuer,' No. 34), with considerable appreciation of its beauties of phrase. This work led up to the concerto for two violins, which went well, and would have gone even better with a little more elasticity in the tempi.

'The Appeasing of Æolus' which ended the concert met with varying fortune. The choir began well in the vivid chorus of the winds, but showed signs of raggedness before the end. Mr. Murray Davey lost his place in Æolus's great song, and was not very quick in finding it again; Mr. John Adams came to grief in a recitative, and the omission of several of the arias detracted from the interest of the work as a whole.

In the second concert the songs were 'Sweet comfort my Jesus comes' ('Süsser Trost,' No. 151) and 'From my eyes the salt tears showering' ('Ich hatte viel Bekummerniss,' No. 24). Miss Silk and Mr. Gervase Elwes, the respective soloists in these numbers, helped by their performances to restore the credit of the art of singing Bach. The choir took no part in this programme, which began with an admirable performance of the Suite or Overture in B minor for flute and strings, given by M. Louis Fleury and the London Symphony Orchestra. The concertos and overtures already mentioned made up a well-planned and well-executed programme. Amongst them the Concerto for three pianofortes stood out as a performance of special excellence.

The Monday and Tuesday performances, the Motets and the Mass, were chiefly remarkable for the wonderful unanimity with which Dr. Allen has inspired his choral singers. It would be easy to recall more brilliant performances of 'Sing to the Lord' by the picked choirs from the North, who have made a speciality of the work; but the choirs—whether of the North or South or of anywhere else—who could put this along with 'Come, Jesu, come' and 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure' into a single programme, and sing all three with intimate understanding of Bach's subtle differences of mood and treatment, must be very few. It is in such performances that the consistent work of years tells, and more than compensates for any incidental defects of tone or choral technique that may be noticeable here and there.

The Motet concert opened with a repetition of the chorale 'Jesu, Joy of man's desiring,' which was heard on the first night, but which on this occasion was accompanied by Dr. Harold Darke on the organ. The organ solos played by Mr. Thalben Ball, Miss May Harrison's performance of the Chaconne, Mr. Samuel's of the Pianoforte Cantata, and Miss Ethel McLelland's of the songs, were all worthy of their places in the programme, which however had the fault of being just a shade too long as a whole, though there was nothing to wish away.

In the performance of the Mass Miss Flora Mann, Miss Berger, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Topliss Green were the solo singers, and their performances showed a higher level of efficiency than did those of the solo singers in the Cantata programme. The ladies suffered from the disadvantage of being two where Bach so clearly intended three. The 'Christe Eleison' is for two sopranos, and the 'Et in unum Dominum' for soprano and alto. Miss Mann sang the 'Laudamus Te,' generally considered the prerogative of the soprano, although it is marked '2nd soprano' and written entirely in the 'mezzo' range. She had not sufficient quality in the middle notes of her voice, and Mr. W. H. Reed, who played the violin obbligato, overweighted her; and Miss Berger, really a second soprano, had not the rich alto tone needed for the ending of the 'Et in unum Dominum' or the two alto arias. The result was that all the women's solo work sounded rather colourless and undistinguished, but this was not entirely the fault of the individuals concerned. Mr. Gervase Elwes sang with the conviction characteristic of him and the certainty of long experience. Mr. Topliss Green, without having the latter advantage, showed considerable promise, particularly in his intelligent treatment of the 'Et in Spiritum Sanctum.' But it was the choir and the orchestra which gave us the great wealth of experiences that make the Mass unique. The band, a contingent of the London Symphony Orchestra, seemed just the right size in the ensembles, and the various obbligati were beautifully played. It was sufficient to support the singers, while not large enough to force them to shrillness or harshness. From the long sweeping phrases of the first 'Kyrie' to the majestic climax of the 'Dona nobis pacem' (in which, by the way, the trombones assisted to fill out the score) the singers were generally well within their tonal range, and though there were some places—such as the 'Cum Sancto Spiritu' of the 'Gloria'—where individual voices just failed to hit their mark, the Choir succeeded in conveying the exuberant vitality of the music without missing its dignity and its depth.

It is thirteen years since Dr. Allen took up the baton of the Bach Choir which Dr. Walford Davies laid down. They have been years in which the Choir, like almost every other musical organization in this country, has passed through unexpected difficulties and vicissitudes. But he has held to his purpose with unflinching tenacity, and the long series of performances—some in concert-rooms, others in Westminster Abbey—culminating in this Festival have justified him. The door-keepers at the Central Hall shouting 'Ticket-holders only,' as the huge audience pressed up the stairs for the performance of the Mass, showed how fully the purpose had been fulfilled: it has been to fire the musical life of London with the mighty flame of J. S. Bach.

Opera in London

By FRANCIS E. BARRETT

CLOSE OF THE BEECHAM SEASON: THREE BRITISH WORKS

One stage of the striking operatic record came to an end on April 10, when the Beecham Opera Company brought its Covent Garden season to a close after the representations had been extended for a week. At the Surrey Theatre the performances were still going on at the time of writing, though it is understood that there will be a vacation shortly. At the 'Old Vic,' as the helpful Waterloo Road undertaking is affectionately styled, the work goes on for some time yet. London is not likely to be without opera in English for any considerable period, as a visit from the Carl Rosa organization is due this summer.

Before discussing the result of the unprecedented amount of opera-giving that has been going on in the Metropolis, my first business is to complete the record of achievement by reference to sundry productions which took place last month too late for mention.

'A VILLAGE ROMEO AND JULIET'

In Mr. Frederick Delius's 'A Village Romeo and Juliet,' which the Beecham Company gave at Covent Garden in March, is found the first British work the Company has mounted for some time. Mr. Delius's composition was originally produced by Sir Thomas Beecham ten years ago, at a date when he sought to attract the public with British operas, his programme for that purpose also including Sullivan's 'Ivanhoe.' At that time Mr. Delius was less well known than he is now. More examples of his genius have since had a hearing, so that to-day there is no difficulty in placing him. His 'Village Romeo and Juliet' makes it clear that he will not be placed as an operatic composer. The work, I believe, was well received on the Continent a decade back, as is perfectly understandable, but here the case is altered. British audiences have always been made familiar with examples of opera that were in every sense operatic on accepted lines. Alteration of those lines I am the last to oppose. There must always be progress, but I hold that progress should maintain the characteristics of the form. As music, Mr. Delius's score is one of the most beautiful examples I have ever heard; but it is not opera. Operatic music should be an illustration of mood. If there is but one mood in the plot, then there need be but one mood in the music. There are several moods in the story so awkwardly styled 'A Village Romeo and Juliet.' Yet the music depicts but one mood: a mood of complacent, unemotional beauty indifferent alike to plot and passion and assuming but a slightly varied tinge at so obvious a moment as the Dream Wedding. Perhaps it will point my plaint better if I outline the story by the Swiss poet Zeller as adapted for the stage. The Romeo and Juliet are two children of neighbouring landowners who quarrel over the question of the ownership of a piece of land. The children and the quarrel are both shown in a Prologue. Grown up, the children remain attached to one another, but their union is forbidden by the parents. Meeting in secret they see themselves wedded in imagination, and the ceremony, with accompanying wedding bells, is shown—the one in a vision, the other in the score. They visit a fair, which is duly represented, 'with effects,' and finally embark on the river in a crazy punt which sinks with the weight of these heavy-hearted lovers, and both are drowned. This is, admittedly, not an exciting story for present-day people, who at the very least will ask why these twain did not follow the example of their Shakespearean namesakes and find a sympathetic Friar Lawrence, or essay the apparently easily accomplished Scottish method. But an opera may have 'nothing in the story' and yet be attractive. This, unfortunately, is not the case with 'A Village Romeo and Juliet.' The music reveals the couple as only very untemperamental people spending their time as Adam and Eve are reputed to have done in 'sitting and thinking and sometimes just sitting.' I do not consider that the cause of British opera was advanced at all by the revival of this example. It is not the kind of thing to attract the 'new' public, and does not give them a true idea of what the British operatic composer can accomplish. I should add that Mr. Walter Hyde appeared in his original part of the lover—the sole survivor of the 1910 production—and that Miss Licette was the Juliet. Sir Thomas Beecham conducted, and the score, which has so much originality of thought and method, to say nothing of tonality, was admirably given under his wholly sympathetic hand. But his endeavours to induce the public to accept this as an example of British opera were misplaced and indicate a faulty judgment. To establish British opera in the esteem of the public there must be a common factor. I do not assert that British work must be in the passion-tearing style of Continental opera, for that is the product largely of the Latin peoples, and we are still Anglo-Saxon. But I think I may claim that British operatic music should at least be faithful to the mood of the story it illustrates, and that there should be some light and shade, some high lights and deep shadows, and something more than the presentation of the obvious.

MR. DE LARA'S 'NAÏL'

There is more of the real operatic spirit in Mr. Isidore de Lara's 'Naïl,' which was the second and last British work to be given. In this instance Mr. de Lara reminds me of the man who when playing Othello blacked himself all over. Mr. de Lara has gone into Eastern idiom far too thoroughly. He never establishes the common factor; in other words, never gains the ear of his audience by phrase or passage they can grasp. His Eastern intervals are faithful enough, making allowance for the difference in scale and the absence of the characteristic quarter-tone; but this very fidelity tells against the comprehension of his music. To be acceptable to Western ears the Eastern idiom must be modified. Félicien David's 'Le Desert' remains a model of such translation, and Mr. Granville Bantock has in his 'Omar Khayyam' succeeded in establishing atmosphere without straining his listeners' attention. Mr. de Lara, then, is just a little too thorough, with the unfortunate result that the public turn away from a work that is by no means without merit. I fancy too that the story tells against the opera, for it is very slight and badly needs a counter-theme. The prolonged duet style, though successfully adopted by such opposites as Wagner and Puccini, requires very forcible music to carry it through. The opera is beautifully mounted, with a wealth of picturesque detail and full representation of the gorgeousness of the East. Unfortunately similar brilliance of hue is not reflected in the music. Nevertheless the piece is more in accord with operatic style as understood in this country, and I should not be surprised if with a more inspiring and less restraining libretto Mr. de Lara did not some day give us a really good and effective opera. The cast was as before, with Miss Rosina Buckman, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Percy Heming on the stage, and Sir Thomas at the conductor's desk.

THE REST OF THE RÉPERTOIRE

Mozart's 'The Magic Flute,' which this Company has done so much to popularise, has been given again during the month, but with rather less effect than before. The appeal it made when first presented by this organization arose from the fact that there was a real bass to sing the bass music. Unfortunately, Mr. Robert Radford, the real bass in question, has left the Company—to its loss. Mr. Foster Richardson, who took the Sarastro, is a singer to whom I always feel grateful because he is one of the very few vocalists before the public who sing their words clearly. His low notes lack the sonority for the 'Magic Flute' music, and the effect was somewhat mechanical. The only character represented in the right spirit was Papageno, in which Mr. Frederick Ralaw excels and has now done so in two languages.

It should be recorded also that the operatic twins 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and 'Pagliacci' have made their appearance again under this management. At one time there was a laudable attempt to sever them by substituting Bizet's 'Djamileh' for 'Cavalleria,' but the operation was not successful. Still it should be worth trying again, for the Mascagni work after twenty-nine years of familiarity does not grow less tawdry. The performance in which Madame Stralia, M. D'Oisly, Miss Kathleen Moore, and Mr. W. Michael took part but emphasised the fact. 'Pagliacci,' a better though possibly less original work—a curious fact—was much more satisfactory. M. Dinh Gilly, the Tonio, gave the key-note at the beginning with a finely judged and sung version of the Prologue for which the audience very justly applauded him to the echo, in recognition of his temperamental display. Miss Desirée Ellinger was a pretty Nedda, Mr. F. Blamey a vigorous and telling Canio, and Mr. William Michael sang uncommonly well as Silvio, his efforts during the evening, first as Turiddu and then in the Leoncavallo, being of a notable order. Mr. Aylmer Buesst and Mr. Clarence Raybould were the conductors of the evening, and the work of the latter in 'Pagliacci' struck me as being particularly good. Mr. Raybould led the orchestra and was not led by it—as is the case with some of our gesticulatory baton wielders.

After an extra week, including a special matinée of 'Parsifal,' the season came to an end on April 10 with 'The Mastersingers,' given with a blaze of triumph as well as of orchestral sound, the latter drowning the singers completely for the greater part of the evening. At the end Sir Thomas Beecham made a speech promising the return of the Company to Covent Garden in six months' time and, somewhat rashly, prophesying that in a twelve-month we should have performances of opera in English equal to those of any Continental city. The wish is no doubt father to the thought, but there is a great deal to be done before our English representations will reach the foreign standard. There is no doubt that they can do so, for we have the material; but I have not seen it at Covent Garden yet. Sir Thomas would have been wiser to put the date at ten years hence, in order to give time for the cultivation of the necessary talent for making our English representations as good as those of the Continent.

THE SURREY PERFORMANCES

The undertaking at the Surrey Theatre is steadily gaining the approval of the public. It must not be forgotten that the ground has been well-prepared for a number of years by the work at the Old Vic, so that grand opera is not altogether unfamiliar in South London. It is just as well to realise that a scheme of this kind must make a distinctive appeal, and if it is not to be local then it must have something definite. It seems to me that the title 'Opera for the people' I have conferred on it suits it very well. There is no reason why this art form should not be at the disposal of the masses as well as of the classes. Certainly the masses have—as I have always maintained they would—taken most kindly to opera. I fancy the management at the Surrey have rather spoiled their public by accustoming them to a fresh addition to the repertoire each week. It must be a difficult thing to find something new that is within the Company's means. I am inclined to think also that in these days when wages rule higher than they have ever done before, the Company would be quite justified in charging a little more for seats. No one has advocated cheap opera more strongly than I, but times have changed. Everything is up, and opera prices may very well be up too. The plan of giving a fresh opera each week has however proved of advantage to the British composer, for he has been called upon to contribute. As a result two British works have been mounted.

THE SURREY 'ROMEO AND JULIET'

The 'Romeo and Juliet' produced at the Surrey Theatre by the Fairbairn-Miln Company is in every respect a notable work. The composer is Mr. J. E. Barkworth, an Oxford man at present a science professor at Cambridge; a pupil of Humperdinck and Mr. Cecil Forsyth. His opera has the distinction of illustrating at least two definite principles. The first is found in the libretto, which is pure Shakespeare—not in any sense adapted, but used verbatim with sundry omissions. The other is Mr. Barkworth's tonal creed. In his own words it:

'aims at simplicity. It will not satisfy the modernists; the discords are all resolved; key and time are nowhere doubtful . . . and some of the themes have not an accidental in them.'

This is a cue to Mr. Barkworth's musical belief—he clearly holds that the possibilities of the diatonic scale are not exhausted. His expression of belief carries a good deal of conviction, for his music is gloriously melodious, unflinching in its eloquence, and charming in its effect. I might describe it as British in the best sense, according to a certain period. But the story of the Montagues and Capulets is not all smoothness, and I am inclined to quarrel with Mr. Barkworth for not recognising the fact. His aim, he says, is to express the text, and the text is not without its rugged lines; yet there is no suggestion of this in the music. One thing I must say in justice to Mr. Barkworth is that the representation was of such an ill-prepared kind that it is possible some of the music did not sound as he intended. But I do not think bad interpretation can eliminate climax if it exist, and it was this climax I could not discover. The orchestration struck me as particularly good. There is some charming writing for the wind, and the composer's use of string tone was as courageous as it was gratifying. But I longed for a sforzando. Those concerned with the performance did their best, though insufficiency of rehearsal handicapped them. Miss Sylvia van Dyck acted a good deal better than she sang as Juliet, yet with the assistance of an admirable Romeo in Mr. Frank Webster—an operatic tenor of whom we ought to hear something—contrived to make clear much of the beauty of the Balcony Scene for which Mr. Barkworth has composed some remarkably appropriate music. The work of Miss Myra Munsen as Lady Capulet was good, and there was excellent intention in Mr. Sumner Austin's Capulet and Mr. E. H. Ludlow's dual effort as Tybalt and the Friar (the latter a very unecclesiastical person). Mr. W. H. Kerridge conducted with keen alertness for keeping the ship together, the composer directing one of the entr'actes just to give us a taste of his quality. Concerning that quality I have no doubts, for Mr. Barkworth is a musician; but as to his ability to fulfil his self-constituted office—in succession to some two dozen other people—of musical illustrator of Shakespeare, I have still to be convinced.

To counter the somewhat hurried presentation of the new work the Company followed the admirable plan of giving several further performances, the first taking place a day or two later, the opera being also included in the following week's repertoire. This is excellent; for good or bad a single performance of a new opera can never suffice, and frequent repetition is but an act of common justice and worthy of emulation in other quarters. 'Repetition is the essence of good teaching' and 'Strike while the iron is hot' are maxims every operatic enterprise should observe.

The other addition to the repertoire has been Verdi's 'Aida,' a bold venture received with a warmth of approval that justified the step. Miss Maryan Elmar, a soprano with a pure, steady, and telling voice made an excellent Aida in spite of no great familiarity with the stage, Miss Antoinette Fairbairn was a thoroughly reliable Amneris, Mr. Andrew Shanks sang well as Amonasro, Mr. P. Vallentine was the High Priest, Mr. E. H. Ludlow the King, and Mr. Lissant Beardmore the Radames. Chorus and orchestra were good, and were always kept well in hand by Mr. Herbert Ferrers at the conductor's desk. The production, which evidently delighted the patrons, was certainly highly creditable.

MR. GATTY'S 'THE TEMPEST'

Any doubts that may have risen in my mind, as the result of hearing Delius and De Lara, concerning the ability of the British composer to write opera were effectively dispelled when Mr. Nicholas Gatty's 'The Tempest' was produced at the Surrey Theatre on April 17 by the Fairbairn-Miln Company. Briefly, it is one of the best British operas as yet given to the world. Good as were the examples of the old days, they had not the modernity of a work like this. A special working version of Shakespeare's play has been prepared for musical treatment by Mr. Reginald Gatty. The play gives the composer plenty of scope. I have never heard music for the stage so faithful to mood as this. The composer falls in with the phases of the story as to the manner born. It is a most successful musical investment, as it should be, for if Englishmen cannot provide music to Shakespeare, then who can? From the fury of the storm, faithfully enough depicted, Mr. Gatty passes on to illustrate Prospero, and then Ariel, the latter with some of the happiest of phrases. The lovers, Miranda and Ferdinand, are given excellent matter, distinguished by its passionate style and well-worked climax. Each of the other characters has its own musical high light, and this very power of characterisation reveals the nature of Mr. Gatty's ability. Charm and power alternate all through the score. A felicitous example of the former is found in the Dance of the Reapers and Nymphs, and the latter is never absent from the utterances of Prospero. The representation of Ariel is particularly happy in its fancifulness and imagination, while a very complete measure of its effect was realised. In his instrumentation the composer reveals exceptional ability. He does not always forget his student days when the Wagner score was held up as the one model, but he thinks a good deal for himself and gives us some very delightful and wholly original passages. What I find of particular value in the greater part of Mr. Gatty's music is its thoroughly British idiom. He makes it clear that such a thing is not impossible, and shows practically that it can be expounded with complete success. Certainly the work is in every way a notable example of British effort. It is original in expression and consistent in its illustration of its theme. The performance was not particularly smooth, but this can be passed over in view of the gratification arising from the fact that the work has been given at all. Miss Gladys Moger distinguished herself greatly as Ariel, Miss Ida Cooper was the Miranda, Mr. Mackie Lyon sang the music of Fernando thoroughly well, and a notable success by means of richness of voice and distinction of style was won by Mr. Andrew Shanks, the Prospero. Mr. Gatty conducted, the orchestral playing being exceptionally good. The reception was marked by genuine enthusiasm.

PAVLOVA BALLET

DRURY LANE SEASON BY THE FAMOUS RUSSIAN DANCER

Devotees of Terpsichore are somewhat disinclined to be classed with musicians or to acknowledge that their art is in any sense ancillary to music. Yet it must not be forgotten that the two arts have a common parent whose name is Rhythm. From the common basis both take an expression that is individual—the dancer illustrates the rhythm by graceful movement of body, the musician, generally, by equally graceful movement of sound. One appeals to the eye, the other to the ear. Therefore I think that the Musical Times is right in juxtaposing its record of the dancer's and musician's art. The particular dance movement to be recorded is that of the clever Russian lady,

Mlle. Anna Pavlova. Well remembered as one of the 'originals' of the Russian Ballet when first seen in England in 1911, she afterwards created a definite reputation by her appearances at the Palace Theatre with M. Mordkin. She has now returned to London after touring the world, and began a season at Drury Lane Theatre on April 12. Wonderful as Pavlova always was, she is still more wonderful now. Her art has developed beyond all knowledge, and its expressiveness is more complete than ever before. Skilled though the Russian ballet may be, there always seemed to me a limit to its means. Mannerisms prevailed, and there was a Russian accent in all its utterances. Mlle. Pavlova has lost her Russian accent, and now speaks the language of the dance with a purity that reveals it as an art pliant enough to stand alone save for the assistance of music. She covered a good deal of ground in her first programme, which comprised a charming if shivery number entitled 'Snow-flakes,' based on—but not, as one would wish, consisting entirely of—Tchaikovsky's 'Casse-Noisette' ballet; a good dramatic piece called 'Amarilla' (Glazounov and Drigo), in which she appears as a gipsy dancer in love with a count who discounts her; and finally in illustration of Saint-Saëns's 'Le Cygne.' The last is music written to a programme of course, but not a programme of dance. Thus the dancer had a special opportunity for the exercise of her art, and she used it well. I note that her whole being is brought to bear in her work. Pavlova is not content to use her feet and naught else—every part of her body is employed to express something, and to extraordinary technique of foot she adds movement of arms, hands, and eyes to convey her meaning, all the embodiment of delicacy and grace. No wonder then that the packed house 'rose' at her after her first number in 'Snow-flakes,' did its best to get her to repeat an ecstatic Valse in 'Amarilla,' and cheered itself hoarse after 'Le Cygne.'

She is supported by a notably good company, headed by M. Volinine—a male dancer of the genuine order, and not merely an acrobat—Mlle. Karalli, and others, who well preserve the high quality of the work of the corps of which M. Clustine is the moving spirit. M. Theodore Stier directs the orchestra. As a first variation on the programme, the Ballet from Massenet's 'Thaïs' was given, along with some illustrations of Chopin compositions, and a wondrous new solo number for Pavlova entitled 'The Dragon Fly.' Each programme contains a half-dozen or so divertissements in the shape of dances to more or less well-known compositions that serve very well to show the range of the art of the great dancer in particular and of her company in general.

On April 13 Dr. Haydn Keeton completed fifty years of service as organist and choirmaster of Peterborough Cathedral. We are glad to hear that it is proposed to celebrate such a notable tenure of office by establishing a scholarship for the benefit of choristers or past choristers of the Cathedral, to be known as 'The Keeton Scholarship.' The proposal has influential support, both ecclesiastical and lay. The committee feels that there must be many members of the public who have derived benefit and pleasure from Dr. Keeton's devoted work during his fifty years of office, and it has therefore issued an appeal which we trust will meet with a worthy response. Subscriptions should be sent to Messrs. Barclay, Ltd., Peterborough.

The musical score is written for a four-part vocal choir (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and piano accompaniment. The key signature is one sharp (F#), and the time signature is common time (C). The lyrics are: "fence blot . . . from Thy sight, And light - en Thou . . . our blot . . . from Thy sight, And light - en, light - en Thou our sight, . . . from Thy sight, . . . And light - en Thou . . . our . . . from Thy sight, And light - en Thou our dark - ness, Lord. . . . dark - ness, Lord. . . . dark - ness, Lord. . . . ness, Lord. . . .". The piano accompaniment features a variety of textures, including arpeggiated chords, sustained chords, and moving lines. Dynamics include dim. (diminuendo), p (piano), and mp (mezzo-piano). The score is divided into systems, with the vocal parts and piano accompaniment staves clearly delineated.

First system of the musical score. It features a vocal melody in treble clef and a piano accompaniment in bass clef, both in the key of D major (two sharps). The vocal line begins with a mezzo-piano (mp) dynamic. The lyrics are: "May no vile dream our mind as - sail, No craft - y foe our". The piano accompaniment consists of a steady eighth-note bass line and a treble line with chords.

Second system of the musical score. The vocal melody continues with the lyrics: "sleep . . in - vade, Nor e - vil thought . . o'er us pre - vail That". The piano accompaniment includes a poco cres. (poco crescendo) marking. The system concludes with a repeat sign.

Third system of the musical score. The vocal melody continues with the lyrics: "so our flesh im - pure . . be made. . .". The piano accompaniment includes a cres. (crescendo) marking. The system concludes with a repeat sign.

No. 142.

THE ASSOCIATION OF MUSIC COMPETITION FESTIVALS.

Chairman: Lady Mary Trefusis.

Hon. Secretaries: Mrs. Argles and Dr. A. Somervell.
Secretary: Miss Maddock, 20, Berkeley Street, W.1.

It has been decided to revive the Annual Conference of this Association. By kind permission of the Lord Mayor, this year's meeting will be held at the Mansion House on Saturday, June 12, when the Rt.-Hon. H. A. L. Fisher, M.P., and Sir Henry Hadow have promised to speak. Suggestions for subjects to be discussed must reach the Secretary not later than May 26.

AN INTERNATIONAL COMPETITION AT CHARLEROI.—August-September, 1920.

The 'Union Chorale Carolorégienne' issues an invitation to choirs of the Allied Countries to compete in a Festival to be held at Charleroi during the holiday months. We give prominence to the announcement, for the prospect of combining a visit to Belgium with an opportunity of measuring their strength by Continental standards may possibly appeal to some choirs in England. We will therefore give a brief summary of a somewhat complicated syllabus.

The Festival will be held on the following dates:

Sunday, August 15*—Troisième Division et Division spéciale de Choraes Mixtes.

Monday, August 16—Deuxième Division.

Sunday, August 22—Première Division.

" " 29—Division d'excellence.

" September 5—Division d'honneur.

There is no indication whether the portioning of a special class for mixed-choirs implies that the other classes are not for mixed-choirs. These categories seem to refer to a perpetual and universal system of grading adopted by Belgian and French 'Concours' on a grand scale. Whether English choirs that competed at Paris in 1912 are affected by the system is not made clear. There is a rule that a choir which has won a first prize since 1910 can only enter in a higher division, and that a choir which has once competed cannot enter into a lower division than before. The divisions 'd'excellence' and 'd'honneur' in Belgium correspond to the divisions 'supérieures' and 'd'excellence' in France. The 'Troisième division' appears to rank lowest.

In each class there is a prescribed test, to be issued with French, Flemish, English, and Italian words 'if there is space,' and each choir must sing a piece of its own choice. Order of singing will be decided by a drawing of names to take place at Charleroi on May 30, which two delegates from each choir must attend. The prescribed tests can be purchased by the delegates on the same date.

The 'Jury' will represent the nationalities of all choirs taking part. Prizes vary from 200 francs (fourth prize in the lowest division) to 5,000 francs (the first prize 'd'honneur').

The secretary is M. O. Goebel, Grand Café du Théâtre, place du Sud, Charleroi, Belgium. Applications for entry must arrive not later than May 15, and must be accompanied by an entrance fee (25 to 100 francs, according to class), which is returnable when the choir competes.

This is short notice for a choir that now reads of the Charleroi competitions for the first time, and it may be difficult to solve some of the mysteries of the regulations by May 15. There are other conditions that wear a somewhat forbidding aspect to English eyes. For instance, the committee require names, addresses, occupations, and signatures of all the singers, these to be fully certified by the president, secretary, and conductor of the choir. For some reason, they are also curious as to the social standing of a choir. Moreover, the concealment of the prescribed test until after the closing of entries is unsatisfactory according to our notions.

However, it is to be hoped that British choirs will not be entirely unrepresented, both for the honour of our choral-singing and for the sake of international friendship. Certainly a British choir would be enthusiastically welcomed at Charleroi. A word of warning is due to any who should undertake the venture. With the best will in the world the organizers of the Paris Festival in 1912 were unable to cope with the business of finding suitable accommodation for all their visitors. Without presuming an equal incapacity on the part of the Charleroi authorities, it may be recommended that a British choir should undertake every detail of their arrangements for journey, housing, and feeding.

BLACKPOOL.

In our issue for March we gave a list of the choral tests chosen for this year's Festival. In the tests for the mixed-voice (Challenge Shield) class the work of Elgar is entitled 'Love's Tempest,' and not 'The Tempest.' The following songs have been chosen for the solo-singing:

Soprano (dramatic).—Senta's Ballad from 'The Flying Dutchman' (Wagner).

Soprano (operatic).—Recit. and Aria, 'Caro nome,' from 'Rigoletto' (Verdi).
